

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

PREFACE.

ALTHOUGH some decry the primer system because of its necessary meagreness of detail, it is conceded by many that the English primers of history and literature recently published are invaluable as forming a foundation upon which a detailed study of the subjects may be based. The same system has been followed in this little work. The aim of the writer has been to present simply and briefly, without any attempt at fine writing, the chief events of our country's history, their causes and results.

The work has been published without pictures, for the reason that school-book illustration has reached such a high degree of perfection that an attempt to compete with those already in the market would so increase the cost of the book as to interfere with its general use as a text-book. It always seems absurd, too, to attempt to picture scenes of warfare when the page allows only space for a scene which fails utterly to give an adequate idea of the event illustrated.

As the intelligent study of history depends greatly upon a knowledge of the local geography of the country under consideration, carefully prepared maps have been introduced, showing the growth of the country and the scenes of her wars.

A full series of questions, classified in chapters, will be found at the end of the book, as it was thought better not to interrupt the narrative by their insertion at the end of each chapter.

NOTICE TO TWELFTH EDITION.

THE fact that, since its introduction three years ago, eleven editions of this Primer have been exhausted should be sufficient proof of the satisfactory character of the work. When one realizes the number of excellent and attractive histories in the market, the success of this shows either a still increasing tendency toward primers, or an acknowledgment of the suitability of this special primer to the needs of classes and individuals.

Before offering the twelfth edition to the public, additions have been made so as to bring the history down to the present. The Constitution of the United States and a few questions thereupon have also been added, in the conviction that every intelligent member of a republic ought to be familiar with the laws by which his country is governed.

PRIMER OF UNITED STATES HISTORY.

CHAPTER I.

DISCOVERIES.

The Northmen.—Away up in the northwestern part of Europe lived the Northmen, or Norse, a people who were great sailors. They were a large, strong race, wearing skins of animals for robes, and heavy armor, and who were never content unless they were roving about on the sea, or destroying or carrying off goods belonging to the people on whose shores they landed. So much were they feared, and such fierce fighters were they, that besides Norway and Denmark, they got possession of part of the country now called France, and also of parts of England.

A party of these Northmen sailed from Denmark about the year 900, and in a storm was driven upon the shores of Iceland. Thus Iceland was found by chance. Some years afterward this island was settled by Danes, who made trading voyages back and forth from the mainland. About thirty years after this, Greenland was found by an Icelander who had sailed in a direction not usually taken ; and some of the Iceland people went there to live.

One of these trading parties started for Norway, and the ships were separated by a storm. When one of them reached Norway, the leader found that his father had sailed for Greenland. He started in the same direction, but another storm drove him to the southwest. After two or three days he found himself near land which he knew could not be Greenland, because he had been told that its shores were rough and covered with ice hills, and these shores were quite flat and covered with wood. So on he sailed, and although he saw land several times, would not allow his men to go on shore. His crew were very angry at this, for the voyage had been long, and they were tired of it; and perhaps, too, they were curious to know what kind of a country it was that they had reached. How differently the leader would have acted if he had known that these were the shores of a new world! As it was, he paid no heed to their complaints, and sailed away, and after a few days came in sight of land again. This time it was indeed Greenland, and glad they must have been to get back to their own people, and tell them what they had seen.

At last a brave captain, named Leif the Lucky, thought he would like to find out whether these stories were true, and having bought the vessel in which the others had made the voyage, started off with a small number of men, about the year 1000. To their great surprise, the land was found just where it had been described. They made several landings before they came to a place which pleased them, and there they built huts in which to pass the winter. From time to time they sent out parties to explore the country around, and one day a man came back to the huts in great joy, saying that he had found vines and grapes. He was not believed at first, but the next day others went with him and found them. When they began to think about going home, they filled their ship with felled trees, and piled the deck with grapes. It was on account of the grape vines that Leif the Lucky gave the country the name of Vinland.

Some years passed, and a brother of Leif named Thorvald, thinking that the former sailors had been too hasty in their return, visited Vinland, and finding the place in which the huts had been built, spent the winter there. In the spring his men were attacked by strange-looking men, who shot at them with arrows, and then ran away as fast as they could. But the Norse leader was wounded so that he died, and this so disheartened his men that they went back to Greenland.

Of course these men talked a great deal about Vinland, and told wonderful stories about the beauty of the country and its pleasant climate; for, no doubt, even the cold of winter was not as severe as these hardy people were used to bear in their own country. Several other companies were tempted to go to Vinland, and tried to found a colony; but some were attacked by Indians, against whose arrows the armor of the Northmen was a poor defense; and others quarreled with their own people, and could not live together. Therefore, as they were not strong enough to live apart, they were forced to give up the idea of settling.

It is supposed that Leif the Lucky landed at Labrador, and then at other places on the coast, until he got as far south as Massachusetts; and that it was here his party stayed. Others went to Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, and Rhode Island. But their discoveries did no good, except to satisfy their love of adventure; and if it were not for their own legends, it would be difficult to believe that they ever came to our country.

CHAPTER II.

Columbus.—Thus you see that the discoveries of the brave Norsemen were useless, because nobody but themselves knew anything about them. There were no newspapers in those days to tell people what was being done all over the world, nor did people travel about then as they do now. Nearly five hundred years had passed away before anybody else found his way to the new world ; and then it was not thought to be a new world, but a part of the old world, only reached in another way. But, during these five hundred years, great changes had taken place in Europe.

When the great Roman empire was destroyed by the fierce tribes that rushed in upon it, scarcely any one paid any attention to the study of geography, and the arts and sciences, as they had done before that time. Now the countries along the Mediterranean Sea began to trade with one another, and to grow wealthy. Of course, the merchants must have traveled back and forth, and in that way they came to know not only the people of other countries, but also to learn many things that they did not know before. Among other things that they learned was the art of sailing ships. Great improvement was made in ship-building. The mariner's compass had been invented, and sailors did not have to depend upon the stars to steer by.

The people of Western Europe were trying to make use of this new knowledge by finding a way to India by sailing around Africa, instead of making the long, tedious journey that they had hitherto been forced to make overland. At this time a great man appeared, who found, as he thought, a short road to India, but who really gave to Europe a new world.

Christopher Columbus, or Colon, was born in Genoa, about 1447. His father was a carder of wool ; but several of his family were sailors, and with them the boy spent his early years. These men hired themselves to any country that would pay them for fighting ; or, if that failed, they attacked vessels whose cargoes were at all valuable, and took away what they could. Thus Columbus learned to manage a ship, and to govern a crew. In a battle off the coast of Spain the ship in which he sailed was set on fire, and the sailors were compelled to swim for their lives. Columbus reached Lisbon, where there were many of his countrymen, who received him kindly. Here he married the daughter of a famous sailor, who owned many charts and books about the art of sailing, which afterward became his own property.

From these, and from what he knew before, Columbus made up his mind that the world was round, but smaller than people thought ; and that the shortest way to India would be to take a westerly direction. For eighteen years he worked hard to make men believe that this could be done. They were afraid to trust the western seas, which they had always believed to be full of dangers. And, besides, for many years they had thought that the earth was flat, and could not believe anything else.

First, Columbus went to his native city, and offered to go in search of this wonderful India, and if found it should belong to Genoa ; but he was too poor to go without help, and this help the Genoese refused. Then he went to John II. of Portugal, and he was almost on the point of giving him the needed aid ; but the wise men of his kingdom persuaded him not to do it. Then he went to Spain, where he made many good friends, who did all they could to induce Ferdinand and Isabella, the king and queen, to help him. At last, when he had made up his mind to give up trying in Spain, and go to England and France, Isabella decided to help him. Three vessels were procured, the Santa Maria, the Pinta, and the Niña. The Santa Maria was commanded by Columbus ; the Pinta and the Niña by two brothers named Pinzon. These two were small vessels, and not one of them was strong enough for a very long voyage.

On the 3d of August, 1492, Columbus sailed from Palos, and steered for the Canary Islands, where he was obliged to stop and repair his vessels. Then he started on his way across the unknown ocean. As none of his crew had ever been very far from home, you may be sure the voyage seemed very long. At last they lost all courage, and insisted that Columbus should go back to Spain ; but he knew well how to control them, and kept on his way.

On the 12th of October they were all filled with joy at the sight of land, and soon all were on the shores of an island, which Columbus named San Salvador. But he did not see the cities and palaces, and the quantities of gold and precious stones that he thought he should find in India. When he asked the natives where he could find gold, they pointed south. Then he sailed about, in and out among the islands, but did not find what he sought. Meanwhile, the Santa Maria, the largest of his vessels, was wrecked and lost ; and therefore he determined to leave part of his men upon the island to make a colony, while he returned to Spain, to tell what he had found ; for he still thought that the country was a part of India.

Back he went in a wretched little vessel, that scarcely held together until he reached Spain. As soon as he arrived, he hurried to the king and queen to tell them of his success. Their delight knew no bounds ; and everywhere he was greeted as the greatest of men, for giving to Spain a country which would add so much to its wealth. They immediately began to fit out a fleet of ships to go back with him ; and many people who before had laughed at him were now quite ready and anxious to join him.

This time he took a much larger number of ships and people ; but when he reached Hispaniola, where he had left his little colony, no one was there. They had quarreled with the Indians, and had been killed. He then chose another place for a colony, and began building a city ; and, in the meantime, sent bodies of men to explore the country around, and find the gold and wealth he was in search of. When he could be spared from the colony, he too went to explore, and they did succeed in finding some gold.

But the people who had come with him this time were angry with Columbus, for making them think that he had found such a rich country ; for they had to work very hard and then could barely live. They sent such complaints to Spain, that Columbus was forced to return, and he carried with him the gold and cotton which he had found. He was also anxious to know what the sovereigns would advise him to do.

Ferdinand and Isabella decided that they would send more ships and people to the colony. So, in 1498, Columbus sailed for the third time across the ocean. He sent some of the ships direct to Hispaniola, and steered toward the south. After making several landings, he found that he had reached the mainland of a continent, and not an island, as he had done before. This was his first discovery of the continent of America.

Upon his return to Hispaniola, he found that the people had quarreled with one another ; and some of his enemies had so excited the people against him, that they accused him of many things, and carried such falsehoods about him to Spain, that Ferdinand and Isabella sent over an agent to see if the accounts were true, and if true, to send Columbus to Spain. As this man too was an enemy, Columbus was sent home in chains.

His sovereigns were very much shocked at this, and treated him kindly ; but they were so greatly influenced by his enemies that they did not give him back his power over the colony, and he felt that they did not trust him. He afterward went on another voyage, but was shipwrecked, and suffered so many hardships that he died not long after, in 1506, at Valladolid.

CHAPTER III.

DISCOVERIES—CONTINUED.

Amerigo Vespucci, an Italian, went in 1499 on a voyage with Ojeda (who had made one voyage with Columbus) to the country surrounding the Gulf of Mexico. Afterward the King of Portugal gave him three ships, with which he sailed along and explored the coast of South America as far as Patagonia. When he reached home he wrote an account of his voyage, and said that he had been the first to find the mainland of the newly-found country; and, although all the writers of his time say that the honor belongs to Columbus, the continent was called America, from his first name, Amerigo.

John Cabot was a Venetian, living in England, and he thought that if there was a western passage to India, it was to be found toward the north. The King of England (Henry VII.) gave him help in fitting out ships, and he sailed in 1497, taking a north-westerly course, until he came to land which, it is now thought, was the island of Newfoundland. He found the country barren and the weather cold, although it was July, and soon returned to England, taking with him three of the savage natives.

Sebastian Cabot.—In 1498, John Cabot's son Sebastian made a second voyage, taking a large number of people to found a colony. He sailed along the coast for a long distance, probably from Labrador to Cape Hatteras, looking in vain for the strait which would lead him to India. He returned to England, and afterward, in the service of the King of France, he made a voyage, in which he sailed up a river which he called Rio de la Plata (meaning river of silver), but did not make another attempt to form a settlement. It was in consequence of the discoveries of the Cabots that England afterward laid claim to the greater portion of the North American continent.

Ponce de Leon, in the year 1512, left the island of Porto Rico, of which he was governor, to go in search of a land where, the natives told him, he would find not only gold and precious stones in abundance, but where there were streams whose waters gave endless youth to those who drank of or bathed in them. He landed on the coast of a country which he called Florida. But it was in vain that he wandered through the country, tasting and bathing in every stream that flowed through the woods; for, instead of living in endless youth, he died not long after from the poison of an Indian's arrow.

Vasco Nunez de Balboa, from the colony at Hispaniola, sailed in 1513 with a party of explorers down the coast of Mexico, to the isthmus which connects North and South America. There he learned that, at the end of a six days' journey, there was another sea, and a land where there were such quantities of gold that the people ate and drank from dishes made of it. Fighting their way through tribes of fierce Indians, his people came at last to a mountain, beyond which, the guides said, was the sea. Balboa ordered his men to follow, and climbed to the top. With great delight at his discovery of a new ocean, which from its calmness he at once named the Pacific, he took possession of the country in the name of Ferdinand of Spain. He then hastened down the other side of the mountain slope, and when he reached the water, waded in, and declared that it and everything upon it, should belong to his sovereign.

Ferdinand Magellan, a Portuguese, wanted the King of Portugal to give him a fleet, with which he might go in search of a westward route to the Molucca and Spice Islands, that would be shorter than the passage around the Cape of Good Hope, which sailors then used. For some reason the king refused, and Magellan went to Spain, where Charles V. granted his request. This, you see, was the second time that Portugal refused to a great explorer and navigator the help that Spain gave, and so lost the honor of discoveries which might have been hers.

In 1520 he sailed down the coast of South America, looking for a strait that would carry him across the continent, but found none until he came to that which he called after his own name. He sailed through this, and came to the longed-for Southern Sea. But he found himself farther from the islands than he thought, for he sailed toward the northwest for nearly four months before he reached land. This proved to be one of a group of islands which he called the Ladrões. He afterward discovered the Philippine Islands. Here Magellan died; but his party chose another leader and sailed on, touched at some of the islands in the Indian Ocean, sailed round the Cape of Good Hope, and up the coast of Africa, and at last landed in Spain, having sailed around the globe in a little more than three years.

Verazzani.—About the year 1524 the northern part of the eastern coast of the American continent was explored for France by Verazzani. He took back such accounts of the good fishing that the Admiral of France thought it would be well to found a colony.

Cartier.—In 1534 Jacques Cartier was sent with about a hundred men to found this colony. He sailed to Newfoundland, but was disappointed to find that island and the mainland near it barren and rocky. He took possession of the country in the name of France; and then, after sailing up the St. Lawrence River some distance, went back to France, taking with him two sons of an Indian chief, whom he promised to bring back the next year.

When he returned, he sailed up the St. Lawrence to the Saguenay, and afterward to an Indian settlement, to which he gave the name Montreal. The Indians were very friendly, and the two boys whom he had taken to France helped him very much in talking with them. After his return to the settlement many of his men became ill and died, and Cartier took those who were left back to France. Although he was sent with another party in 1541, no colony was founded, and France made no other attempt in North America until 1562, and then a place was chosen in Florida, where the climate was milder, the land more fertile, and everything more attractive than in Newfoundland.

Ferdinand de Soto, who, although he had gained great wealth with Pizarro, in Peru, was anxious for more gold, sailed from Cuba in 1539, and landed on the western coast of Florida. Several parties had gone to Florida and failed; but he thought that in the interior parts of this country, as well as in other portions of the new world, precious metals might be found. On his way inland he met a Spaniard who had been taken captive by the Indians some years before, and he was of great use as a guide and interpreter. The party, learning where gold was to be found, went northward. They forced the tribes of Indians which they met to give them food and be their servants, and were so cruel that often the Indians, knowing very well by this time what the white men wanted, would tell them to go in this direction or that, just to get rid of them. Their next course was westward, as far as the Indian village of Mavilla, now the city of Mobile; then north again, and at last they came to and crossed the great river, the Mississippi. But, before they could find gold and a place to settle in, De Soto died. After his death, his followers decided to return to Cuba. They felled trees for timber, hammered chains, stirrups, and everything else of iron that they possessed into nails, and built small vessels, in which they sailed down the river, fighting as they went with the Indians, who feared and hated them, and were glad to see them going away.

Although these men had been through great dangers, although many of their companions had died from want of food and other causes, and although they had utterly failed in what they went to do, yet they carried to the people in the older colonies such an account of a great country yet to be explored, that another party went to explore it. But this met with a like fate, and the Spaniards did not try again to settle north of the Gulf of Mexico.

CHAPTER IV.

SETTLEMENTS.

PART I.—Virginia, North and South Carolina.— 1607–1670.

ENGLAND had not forgotten the north-western passage to India, and several expeditions went to look for it. The failure of these caused England to send an expedition to discover a north-eastern passage. This also failed. Then the north-western was tried again, and in 1587 John Davis went as far as Baffin's Bay, but could go no farther because of the ice.

At this time Sir Humphrey Gilbert thought that it would be a good plan to send colonies to the New World, and make it a part of England; for he was afraid that Spain, then an enemy of England, might become powerful in the northern as she had already become in the southern part of the continent.

In 1578 he received a charter from Elizabeth which gave him the right to discover, and have for his own, any lands not owned by any other sovereign. He sailed in 1583 with a large company, intending to settle somewhere between the St. Lawrence and Florida. After landing at St. Johns he started southward, but soon found himself in a fearful storm, which forced him out to sea; so he went back to England, meaning to return the next year for silver, and to plant a colony. But the vessel in which he sailed was lost, and the carrying out of his design was left to his famous half-brother, Sir Walter Raleigh.

Raleigh obtained a patent from the queen, and sent out a colony under Amadas and Barlow. They returned with the report of a land abounding in fruits and trees and fish and maize, which so pleased the queen that she called the country Virginia. Several attempts to found a colony here were unsuccessful.

An expedition in 1602, under Gosnold, arrived off Cape Cod, and then sailed southward, touched at Martha's Vineyard, which they named (because, like Leif the Lucky, they had found a land of grapes); then explored the mainland, where they would have stayed, but that their stores gave out, and they were obliged to go back to England. But Gosnold was in part the means of causing two companies, known as the London and Plymouth Companies, to be formed in 1606, for the purpose of planting colonies. The colonies of the London Company could settle between the 34th and 38th degrees of latitude, and those of the Plymouth Company between the 41st and 45th degrees.

Virginia.—The first permanent English settlement was made under the London Company in Virginia, in 1607. The colony, numbering about one hundred men, entered the Chesapeake Bay on the 26th of April, and landed on its southern shore at a point which they called Cape Henry. After they had opened their sealed packet of instructions, and found out who their governor was to be, they spent several days in looking for the best place on which to settle, and at last decided upon a place on the James River, and called it Jamestown.

Not long after their village was built and their forts put up, they became dissatisfied with their governor, Wingfield, and appointed John Smith in his place. Smith traded with the Indians for corn, meat, and other food ; for the colonists would not try to raise any for themselves. He made journeys into the country, and during one of them was taken prisoner, and came very near losing his life. When he got back to Jamestown he found the colony in confusion, and the people, discouraged, preparing to go back to England. Just then Newport came from England with food and supplies, and the people gave up the idea of going home. The help that he brought did not last long, for they did not take any pains to provide for themselves ; and in 1609, when a fleet arrived bringing more people and food, the colonists were in such a starving state, the settlement was in such disorder, and the Indians so troublesome that their leader thought the best thing to do was to leave the place altogether. They were just about doing so when Lord de la Ware appeared with a fleet to take command of the colony.

He rebuilt the fort, made peace with the Indians, and from this time the affairs of the colony were more prosperous. The next governor gave each man an amount of land, and made him cultivate it or starve. Tobacco began to be cultivated in 1616 ; and before long the governor was obliged to limit the amount of land on which one man could raise tobacco, or there would have been no land left on which to grow corn, so well did the tobacco pay the planters.

Still larger tracts of land were given by the king to the company, and still more people were sent over to cultivate it. In 1619 a Dutch vessel brought some negroes from Guinea in Africa, whom the richer planters bought, and thus negro slavery was begun. In the same year the governor ordered that the people should appoint men to meet with the governor and council to make laws for the colony. But these laws had to be approved by the company in London before the people were obliged to obey them. Thus, after many difficulties, the first English colony was firmly established in America.

In 1642 Sir William Berkeley was appointed governor, and he ruled the colony wisely for ten years, during which time its laws were improved and the colony grew in numbers, until, in 1646, there were twenty thousand people in Virginia. And yet, meanwhile, England was in great trouble on account of civil war, which naturally affected the colony somewhat. The colony, too, was attacked by Indians, and lost about three hundred men.

On the death of Charles I. Virginia proclaimed Charles II. king; and Cromwell, who was at the head of the government, determined to make the colony submit to the Parliament. He forbade all ships to enter its harbors, and forced the people to send all their products to England, and sent over a ship of war to carry out these measures. Affairs were settled peacefully, however, and Virginia submitted. But great was the disappointment of the people when, after all, Charles II. became king, to find that he also did great damage to the trade of the colonies, by taxing them and compelling them to send all their tobacco to England, where they did not get the highest price for it. He gave away the lands of the colony to his friends without making any compensation to the planters.

The government became so harsh and severe in other ways that finally the people rebelled, and took up arms, under Nathaniel Bacon, against Governor

Berkeley. Berkeley was at last compelled to leave Jamestown, and the rebels burned it. But Berkeley regained power, restored order, and hanged the leaders of the revolt. In 1675 the king appointed Lord Culpepper governor for life ; but he governed so badly and cruelly that the king removed him and appointed some one else.

North Carolina.—The northern part of the country, extending from the 30th to the 36th degree of latitude, called Carolina, had been settled in two or three places by Virginians, and also by some Puritans from New England. In 1663 Lord Clarendon and others received a grant, and the work of founding a colony really began. The owners of the land taxed the people so highly and gave them such bad governors that they rebelled and chose their own governor. Although they did not keep this power long, they showed by their conduct that they would not submit to injustice. Then better governors were appointed, and the colony grew populous and strong. Their greatest trouble arose from the Indians, and these they finally succeeded in driving out of the country.

South Carolina.—The southern part of this territory was settled in 1670 by a colony from the northern part, which devoted itself to planting, and as the heat of the southern summers was too severe for English laborers, African slaves were brought into the colony in larger numbers than ever before. Many people, too, from Holland, England, and the south of France came to this fertile country, and the colony grew very rapidly. Like their northern neighbors they rebelled against their bad governors, and like them carried on a successful war against the Indians.

At first all Carolina was under one government ; but in 1729 a division was made at the Cape Fear River, and two distinct provinces formed.

CHAPTER IV.—Continued.PART II.—Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire.—1620–1636.

Massachusetts.—In the reign of James I. of England, a number of the English people were dissatisfied with the church established by law, and set up a church for themselves. But they were very badly treated by those who belonged to the Church of England. In order to be able to worship God as they pleased, many of them went to Holland, where they lived for some years, calling themselves Pilgrims because they had no fixed home.

When these people heard of the great tracts of land to be had in America, they determined upon going to a country where they could be free to worship as they chose, and yet keep up the habits and manners of their own country.

Accordingly, a party went from Holland in the Speedwell to Southampton, where they were joined by the Mayflower, with a party from London; and together they sailed in the month of September, 1620. The Speedwell was compelled to return to port, not being strong enough for the voyage, and the Mayflower alone came in sight of Cape Cod in November. The place for a settlement was chosen on the 21st of December, and the party went to work to build their homes. During this winter the colony suffered many hardships. Most of its people were sick, and many died; food was scarce, and they had no means of getting more. But in the following spring, some friendly Indians showed them how to plant and raise Indian corn, and made treaties for them with some of the powerful chiefs of the country. In 1628 a colony arrived, and settled at Salem, on Massachusetts Bay; and when it was decided that the colony should govern itself, still more people came from Holland and England, and by the year 1630 there were settlements from Cape Ann to Plymouth.

They chose for their first governor John Winthrop, and passed very strict laws; so strict, that many of the people were obliged to leave the older colonies and form new ones. For, although the Massachusetts Bay colony was made up of men who had left their homes because they wanted freedom, they were not willing that any should live among them who did not think just as they did.

One of those who differed from them in opinion was Roger Williams, the minister of Salem, who so openly opposed some of the laws which the court had made about religion that he was banished from the colony, and went alone into the Indian country. He was kindly received by the Indians, whose part he had taken when the government would have imposed upon them; and in 1636 he, with a few friends who had joined him, bought a tract of land from the Indians, and made a settlement which he called Providence. Many others who found themselves unable to remain in the colonies in Massachusetts, went to Williams; and in 1638 a chief of the Narragansetts gave them Rhode Island, and a colony was established, where perfect religious freedom was granted to every one.

Meantime, as the settlements around Massachusetts Bay were rapidly growing, parties left them and went inland. Settlements were thus made at New Haven, and at Windsor and Hartford, in Connecticut. New Hampshire had been settled in 1622 by the English, who had gone there for the purpose of trading, and later by some people from Massachusetts; but in 1641 the settlements asked to be taken under the government of Massachusetts, and so remained until 1679, when New Hampshire was made a separate province.

CHAPTER V.

SETTLEMENTS—CONTINUED.

*PART I.—New York, New Jersey, and Delaware.

New York.—While Spain was growing rich by her colonies in South America, and while England was sending ship after ship to find the western passage to the Indies, a small nation was rising to power.

Holland had been dependent upon Spain ; but by the end of the sixteenth century it had fought itself free, and was one of the first countries in Europe. Nearly all the trade with the East Indies was carried on in the ships of the Dutch East India Company, which sailed around the Cape of Good Hope. About the year 1600 they tried to find a north-east passage, and failed.

In 1609 Henry Hudson, an Englishman, sailed from Amsterdam, in a small vessel called the Half Moon, to find this north-eastern passage. Finding his way blocked with ice, Hudson steered for the west, hoping he might find a passage across the western continent to the Indian Ocean. In about two weeks he was opposite the coast of Newfoundland. Steering south, he sailed as far as Delaware Bay ; then turning, sailed north until he came to a beautiful harbor, which he entered just at nightfall. The next morning he found himself in what is now New York Bay.

Thinking this might be a passage across the continent, Hudson sailed up the great river which now bears his name, trading as he went with the friendly Indians for furs and fruits, until he found that the river was becoming more narrow and shallow. Then he returned to its mouth, and soon went back to Europe.

When the Dutch heard of the rich furs that could be bought from the Indians, they began trading with them, and soon built a trading-post on Manhattan Island, and another further up the river. They also explored the country near by, one party sailing through Long Island Sound as far as Rhode Island, and another exploring inland to the Delaware River. In 1621 the West India Company was formed, and sent people over to make settlements, which they did in several places along the river; but, as the little settlements got into trouble with the Indians, they thought it best to make but one colony, and chose Manhattan Island as the best place to settle. This island had already received the name of New Amsterdam, and the surrounding country that of New Netherlands.

In a few years the island was bought from the natives, and protected by a stone fort. The colony numbered nearly three hundred people, and carried on a busy trade with Holland. In 1633 the Dutch purchased land near Hartford, on the Connecticut River, and built a fort, which was afterward given up to the more powerful English, who had several settlements on the river. From 1640 to 1645 the settlements around New Amsterdam suffered from frequent attacks from the Indians. When, in 1647, Peter Stuyvesant was appointed governor, he at once made treaties of peace with the natives. Then too a boundary was agreed upon between the Dutch settlements and those in New England, the line being the same as that which now divides New York and Connecticut.

Early in 1664 the King of England, Charles II., gave to his brother, the Duke of York, all the country between the Kennebec and St. Croix Rivers, and between the Connecticut and Delaware, without any thought of the rights of the people who had discovered and settled it. The Duke of York immediately sent a fleet under the command of Colonel Nichols, to take control of the country ; and after a brief resistance Stuyvesant was compelled to submit, and New Amsterdam became an English province, under the name of New York. Thus the English ruled from Maine to Florida.

New Jersey.—Up to 1664 several settlements had been made in New Jersey, but none remained for any length of time. When the Duke of York received his grant, he gave to Berkeley and Carteret this part of his province. Settlements were made in two or three places, and its name given to the country. In 1675 it was divided into East and West Jersey. East Jersey still belonged to Carteret, West Jersey, being given to William Penn for a Quaker settlement.

Delaware.—In 1623 a large colony came from Flanders to New Netherlands, part of which entered the Bay of Delaware and built a fort, but before long went to New Amsterdam. In 1631 another colony settled at Lewistown, a few miles above Cape Henlopen. This was burned by the Indians in revenge for the death of one of their tribe. In 1637 the Swedes sent a colony to the northern part of Delaware, and a large settlement was formed. A colony which settled near the mouth of the Schuylkill was captured a little later by Stuyvesant, and came under the control first of the Dutch, and afterward of the Duke of York. When Pennsylvania was settled, Delaware was united with it under one government, and so remained until 1691, when it withdrew, and had its own separate government.

PART II.—Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Georgia. —1634–1733.

Maryland.—In 1629 George Calvert, Lord Baltimore, went to Virginia with a colony, with the purpose of settling ; but, being a Catholic, found that he could not take the oath that the government required. He, therefore, obtained from the king a grant of land north of Virginia where he could found a Catholic colony.

He died before his object was accomplished ; but his son, Leonard Calvert, sailed up the Chesapeake to the Potomac, and on the banks of that river made a settlement which he called Maryland. The Virginians were much annoyed about the new settlement in what they called their province ; and Lord Baltimore's greatest trouble was caused by a Virginian named Clayborne, who claimed as his own a part of the country, and who so worked upon the people that they rebelled against their governor. But Calvert soon regained his power over them, and firmly established a colony, which, although intended for Catholics, proved a safe home for men of any creed.

Pennsylvania.—The Quakers were so successful in their colony in West Jersey, and after all their persecutions it seemed such a happy thing that they could at last live undisturbed, that in 1680 William Penn, a Quaker, asked for and obtained the grant of land which became the State of Pennsylvania. His object was to found a state where every one should have equal rights, and law and order be maintained without force. He made a treaty with the Indians which both parties kept unbroken, and in every way was a friend to the natives. In 1682 Philadelphia was founded, and the people began to choose their own governors and make their own laws.

Georgia.—In 1732 George II. granted the charter for a colony between the Savannah and Altamaha Rivers. This was done in answer to the appeal of James Oglethorpe for a colony which would be a home for the poor, who for various reasons had little hope of improving their condition in their own country. The present site of Savannah was chosen for the colony, and thither flocked people, for the most part laborers, from all parts of the world. Treaties were made with the Indians, and slavery was forbidden.

As soon as England declared hostility against Spain in 1739, war broke out between the colonists and their Spanish neighbors in Florida. But the Spaniards were ultimately defeated, and the colony enjoyed peace. But before long discontent began to show itself. The people were poor, and thought it was because they were denied slaves. At first slaves were hired, but soon the same system of labor existed here as in the other Southern colonies.

CHAPTER VI.

INDIAN AND COLONIAL WARS.

Pequot War.—1636.—The first war with the Indians, called the Pequot War, was undertaken to avenge the death of two colonists who had been murdered by the Pequot Indians. Their village on Block Island was attacked and destroyed, and the natives killed or left to starve. This roused the Indians of the mainland, and several settlements on the banks of the Connecticut River were attacked by them.

Meanwhile, the Pequots tried to persuade some of the other tribes to join them in an attempt to drive the English out of the country. Roger Williams, fearing the result, went himself to the chief of the Narragansetts, who had already promised to be friendly to the English, and persuaded him not to break his promise. The Mohegans gave their aid to the English, and a force was raised from the Connecticut settlements, which, under Mason, attacked the Pequots in their fort near the Mystic River and destroyed them. Another attack was made shortly afterward at Fairfield upon what was left of the tribe, and one of the most powerful of the New England tribes was utterly destroyed.

King Philip's War.—1675.—One of the first friends that the English at Plymouth made was Massasoit, the chief of the Wampanoags. When he died, and his son Philip became chief, the young men of the tribe began to show their jealousy of the English, who by degrees had bought up their land until all that they could call their own was part of what is now Rhode Island. And when two young men of the tribe were hung for the murder of an English settler, the Indians in revenge attacked one of the settlements and killed some of its people.

The English immediately sent troops against them, who drove them from Mount Hope, the home of their chief. Then Philip went into Connecticut, where he was joined by some tribes. Many of the settlements were attacked and burned, and numbers of the people most cruelly killed. Next, Philip was joined by the Narragansetts, who at the beginning of the trouble had promised the English to have nothing to do with the war. Three thousand Indians collected in a swamp in Rhode Island were attacked by the English and defeated. Philip escaped, but one thousand were killed, and several hundred taken prisoners; and when, soon after, Philip was killed by a treacherous Indian, all idea of attempting war again was given up.

King William's War.—1689-1697.—James II. of England made himself so hateful to his people by his acts that when, in 1689, William of Orange came to claim the crown, many of the people took his part, and James was forced to leave the country. France, however, insisted that he ought to be king, and war was declared between the two countries.

Any trouble of this kind in the mother countries was certain to cause trouble between their colonies. Accordingly, the French in New France (Canada) and the English in New England took up the quarrel.

The war began in New Hampshire, and extended into New York, the Indians aiding the French. It lasted until 1697, and the colonists took Nova Scotia from the French. But, by the treaty of Ryswick between France and England, the war was ended, William was acknowledged king, and Nova Scotia restored to France.

Queen Anne's War.—1702–1713.—On the death of William III. of England, France took the part of one of the sons of James II. in his claim upon the English crown, and war was again declared between the two countries. The Indians needed little urging by the French to make attacks upon settlements in Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, and in 1701 a company of five hundred men was sent out to aid the distressed villages.

Jealous of the increasing power of the French, the colonies determined at least to attempt to drive them out of Canada, and an unsuccessful expedition was sent in 1707 against Port Royal in Nova Scotia. In 1710 a large expedition carrying five regiments of troops attacked and took Port Royal. Two expeditions were then fitted out to go into Canada, and but for the delay of the commander would have been successful. But France had already asked for peace, and, by the treaty of Utrecht in 1713, England gained possession of Labrador and Nova Scotia, which her colonies had already taken for her.

King George's War.—1744–1743.—This war arose because England and France took opposite sides in the contest as to the rightful claimant to the throne of Austria on the death of Charles VI., a contest in which nearly all the countries of Europe were interested. The principal action in America was the siege of Louisburg in Cape Breton Island. This fortress guarded the entrance to the St. Lawrence River, and the governor of Massachusetts thought that its possession would make the conquest of Canada an easier matter. Nearly all the colonies sent him aid in fitting a force to go against it, and about four thousand men set out under Sir William Pepperell of Maine. To the utter surprise of the French, who thought their fort too strong to be taken, the siege was successful, and the English obtained not only Louisburg, but the whole island.

When peace was made between the mother countries, Cape Breton Island was given back to France, without any regard for the expense and trouble to which the colonists had been put in order to gain it, and not until the final contest between the colonies of the two countries was fought out was it restored to the English.

CHAPTER VII.

THE FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR.—1754-1763.

Causes.—By Cabot's discovery of the eastern coast of North America, England claimed the country through from ocean to ocean. Their settlements stretched along the coast from Nova Scotia to Florida, but did not extend inland. On the other hand, the French, settling first in Nova Scotia, had entered the St. Lawrence, settled at and around Montreal, and then passed westward to the great lakes, and down the Mississippi, and some of the rivers that flow into it from the east.

When the English began to see the need of settling the interior of the country if they would keep it, the French determined to prevent them, and accordingly a company was sent from Canada to settle the region about the Ohio River and to build forts. This company in 1753 attacked a party of English, and took some of the men to Canada as prisoners. This act aroused the anger of the English and also of the Indian tribes of that region, who resented the intrusion of the French, and immediately renewed their treaty with the English.

The governor of Virginia, Dinwiddie, before using force, determined to send a messenger to the French commander, asking him to withdraw from the Ohio. The person chosen for this task was a young surveyor named George Washington, destined to play an important part in the future of his country. In October, 1753, he set out from Williamsburg, near the York River, with a small party, traveled up the Potomac, then across the mountains to the present site of Pittsburgh, then north to Presque Isle (Erie), to the French commander there. But he declared that the French had discovered the Ohio Valley and meant to keep it, and if necessary, would fight for it. It was quite evident to Washington that the French were getting ready for war; for they were strengthening their old forts, and building a new one at the point where the Alleghany and Monongahela Rivers joined, a point that he had himself selected as a good position for a British fort. He hastened back to Virginia as fast as he could, in the bitter winter weather, and learned that a party had been sent out which marched directly to the very spot that both he and the French had chosen. As they were not strong enough, however, to keep it, it was fortified by the French and called Fort Du Quesne.

The War.—The English were now determined to drive the French from the territory, and the first expedition of the war was fitted out in May, 1754, under Washington, to capture Fort Du Quesne. On the 26th he reached Great Meadows, where he built a fort which he named Fort Necessity. Here he learned that the French were at hand, and were going to attack him, whereupon he advanced upon them and defeated them. He then returned to Fort Necessity to wait for more troops; but, before these came, he was attacked by a large body of French, and obliged to give up the fort and to withdraw his troops from the country. The French were left in possession of the Ohio Valley.

Up to this time all action in the matter had been confined to Virginia; but now all the colonies were aroused to their danger, and when orders came from England that they should unite to resist the intruders, they were ready to do so. In June, delegates from seven of the colonies met at Albany and made the necessary plans, and also made further treaties with the chief of the Six Nations, whose confidence in the English had been somewhat shaken by their late defeat. Meantime the French were busy fortifying Crown Point and Niagara.

In September, 1754, the British Parliament saw that something must be done to help the colonies; so they sent over some troops under General Braddock, with orders to take command of all the forces in North America. He was directed to send forces against Acadia, Crown Point, and Niagara, and to go himself against Fort Du Quesne. These points were chosen for attack, for the reason that each was situated in such a way as to command an important position. Acadia, or Nova Scotia, commanded the entrance to the St. Lawrence, and the river from the ocean to Quebec and Montreal; Crown Point commanded the passage to the very heart of the colonies through Lake Champlain; Niagara commanded the passage from the great lakes to the St. Lawrence; and Fort Du Quesne commanded the Ohio Valley, and therefore the passage from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico.

In April, 1755, Braddock left Virginia with two thousand men, most of them British regulars, that is, trained soldiers from England, the remainder provincials. Braddock was an able general, but not at all used to the Indian way of fighting. The Indians did not form themselves into regular bodies and fight openly, but hid themselves behind trees and rocks, or crouched behind shrubs or in a thicket, and could shoot at the regularly formed troops without being much injured in return.

On the 7th of June, the forces assembled at Fort Cumberland on Will's Creek, and then traveled over the mountain to Great Meadows, where Washington persuaded Braddock to leave a part of the army, and push on with the rest to Fort Du Quesne. Following this advice, he approached the fort by a roundabout way; but when near it, fell into an ambuscade of French and Indians, which the French commander had prepared as the only way of saving the fort, for the English force was much larger than his. Five hundred men were attacked in this way in a wood where the road was very narrow, and the troops fell in numbers. The provincials stood their ground bravely, and wanted to adopt the Indian method of fighting; but Braddock thought it cowardly to hide behind the trees, and unwisely forbade it. The regular troops became terrified, and Braddock, who was badly wounded, took Washington's advice and ordered a retreat. The troops that were left fled to Fort Necessity, where Braddock died, and then they went back to Philadelphia. The loss was very great, and the whole country was in despair.

General Braddock's plan had been to take Fort Du Quesne, and then march northward to join General Shirley in the attack upon Niagara; and, at the same time that Shirley left Albany for Niagara, General Johnson was to leave for Crown Point. But as Shirley was about to start, news of Braddock's defeat arrived; and, as many of his men were discouraged and deserted, the idea of an attack was given up, the more readily that Shirley had heard that the French were going to attack Oswego. So he sent a force to strengthen Oswego, and returned to Albany.

Meanwhile, the French had learned that an army had set out for Crown Point, and the force that had been prepared for the attack on Oswego was sent to this place. The English had encamped at the southern end of the lake, which the French called St. Sacrament, but which they called George, after their king, and had built a fort near by, meaning to proceed up to Ticonderoga, at the southern end, on Lake Champlain, as soon as they were joined by more troops. But the French commander, Dieskau, left Crown Point well defended, and marched the rest of his army to within a few miles of the English. On hearing this the English at once started for the fort, but the advance fell into an ambuscade. The English leaders were killed almost immediately ; but the troops retreated in a very orderly manner to the main force, and, protected by their camp defenses, opened such a steady fire on the French that they were obliged to retreat with great loss. After this victory the English strengthened the fort at the head of the lake, naming it Fort William Henry, and placed a garrison there and at Fort Edward.

Although Acadia had been given to England by the treaty of 1713, it was peopled almost entirely by French. Fearing a rebellion among them, a new oath of allegiance was demanded from them, which as Catholics they could not take. A force was sent against them in 1756, and all who would not take the oath were banished from the country.

In the beginning of the summer of 1756 reinforcements arrived from France, under the command of the Marquis of Montcalm. This able general immediately set about fortifying Niagara, and after several attacks upon small places in the neighborhood, attacked Oswego and destroyed the forts. He then withdrew to Montreal. The next summer Montcalm set out for Fort William Henry. The commander there, Colonel Monro, had two or three thousand regulars, and there were about four thousand more at Fort Edward under General Webb.

The French called upon Monro to surrender, which he refused to do, trusting to Webb for aid. This Webb refused to give, and advised Monro to yield. After a week's siege Monro surrendered, and the garrison was massacred by the Indians. The fort was burned, and Montcalm returned to Canada.

At the end of this year, 1757, so great had been the success of the French, that both the colonies and England were very much discouraged. The English troops had far outnumbered the French; but, through want of knowledge in some cases, and through the inactivity of the commanders in others, their strength had been wasted and nothing gained.

But a change in the ministry in England caused a change in the war. A new energy was given to the Americans by the willingness with which the prime minister, Pitt, promised to aid them with arms and other necessities, on condition that the colonies should furnish and pay the men. To this they agreed at once. New commanders were appointed in place of those of the previous year. General Abercrombie was appointed commander-in-chief. The first action of 1758 was an attack upon Louisburg under General Amherst, which resulted in its capture. While Amherst was at this place General Abercrombie attacked Ticonderoga. Montcalm awaited the attack behind his intrenchments, which he strengthened by placing felled trees in front. Abercrombie urged on his men, only to see them fall in numbers. At last they were obliged to retreat, with a loss of nearly two thousand men and one of their best leaders, Lord Howe. Abercrombie withdrew to Fort George, and sent an expedition against Fort Frontenac, at the outlet of Lake Ontario, which was more successful, and the fort was destroyed.

The third expedition planned for this year, which left Philadelphia under command of General Forbes for Fort Du Quesne, was also successful; for the French set fire to the fort and deserted it on their approach. The English flag was raised over the ruins, and the place named Pittsburgh.

Three expeditions were planned for 1759, against Niagara, Crown Point, Ticonderoga, and Quebec, the object being a final attempt to conquer Canada. Niagara surrendered on the second day of the siege. Amherst advanced against Ticonderoga, and the French retreated to Crown Point. The English followed, and the French again retreated. Thus Lake Champlain fell into the hands of the English.

The command of the expedition against Quebec was given to General Wolfe, who had distinguished himself by his bravery at Louisburg. With eight thousand men and a fleet of about fifty vessels under Admiral Saunders, he sailed up the St. Lawrence River in June, and encamped his troops, some just below Quebec, and others on a point opposite the city. Montcalm, expecting an attack, had sent for aid from Montreal, and thought the city was safely guarded, for it was naturally well situated, a part being on the shore of the river, the other on a promontory above, and on this promontory was the fortress. The English threw shells into the city, and did much damage to the upper and lower towns, but could not harm the fortress. Wolfe, therefore, determined on another mode of attack. The French defenses stretched for five miles below the city. He would attack these and weaken the force. An attack was planned by which two bodies of troops, one from each camp, should fall at the same time upon the French at the Montmorenci. But the division from Point Levi ran aground, and the other was badly defeated.

At the back of the upper city was a large plain, and it was quite clear to Wolfe that an attack from that point could not fail. The difficulty lay in getting up to it, as the steep and dangerous paths were well guarded. He called his generals together and told them the plan. They thought it could be done, and on the night of the twelfth of July his men took to the boats, and floated up the river with the tide. Landing at a point a little above the city, they disembarked, climbed the steep paths, and in the morning, to the amazement of Montcalm, who thought them still on the Montmorenci, they were on the Plains of Abraham, marching straight for the city. Montcalm summoned all his troops, and sending to Montreal for more, ordered an attack. The English marched on without returning the fire, until they were near the intrenchments. Then they opened such a deadly fire that the French fled. Both parties lost their brave leaders in the contest.

The next year the French tried to regain Quebec, but failed. Montreal soon surrendered, and the English were masters of Canada. In 1763, when peace was formally settled between France and England, Nova Scotia, Cape Breton, and Canada were ceded to England.

But, in the interval between the fall of Canada and the treaty, the Indians, who had been the firm allies of the French, gave the English constant trouble; and at last a conspiracy was discovered, by which the Indians intended to unite all the tribes and destroy the English. But the Indians found the English ready to meet their attacks, and when news of the peace came they were ready to submit.

By the same treaty, Spain, with whom England had also been at war, gave up Florida, and France ceded Louisiana to Spain, so that the King of France had not a possession left in the country.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR.

Causes.—At the close of the French and Indian War, the colonies had a population of over one and a half million of people. Schools had been founded, several newspapers established in Boston and Philadelphia, and a large trade was carried on with England. The colonies had grown and prospered in spite of many difficulties ; but a new trouble now arose more serious than any that they had hitherto encountered.

The French and Indian War had been a great expense to England, and the English Parliament thought the colonies ought to help pay it. This they were quite willing to do, but wanted to do it in their own way. Hence, when the English Government declared that they should pay it by means of taxes upon some of the articles they were obliged to use, the colonists, through their agents in London, asked that they should not be required to do so unless they were represented in Parliament. But William Pitt was not now prime minister, and those in power were not as friendly to America as he had been ; and besides, the king, George III., was very stubborn, and cared not nearly as much for the good of the colonies as for his own selfish plans. So it is not surprising that, in spite of the friends of the colonies, the Stamp Act was passed in 1765. This act required that all paper used in transacting business should bear a stamp. To this the people were very much opposed. The assembly in Virginia declared that English subjects in America had the same rights as English subjects in England ; that the colonists would not submit to being taxed except by their own representatives. Declarations like these were made in the assemblies in New York and Massachusetts, and in the latter, James Otis proposed that a congress of the colonies should be held. The colonies agreed, and the first Colonial Congress met at New York the 7th of October, 1765. A Declaration of Rights was formed, which was in effect the same as that already passed by Virginia. The stamped paper was destroyed, and the people prepared to resist all efforts at taxation.

When the English Parliament saw how strongly the people in both countries felt about the Stamp Act, it was repealed. But the joy which this caused did not last long, for the government insisted on the right to tax the colonies, and when the people refused to pay, the government said that they were rebels, and sent troops to see that they obeyed, and to keep them in order. These troops were quartered in the houses of the citizens, which was extremely annoying; and when, one day, a quarrel arose between some soldiers and citizens, the people demanded that the governor should remove them.

In 1773 all the taxes were withdrawn except that on tea, and that was reduced to a small sum, the ministers thinking that the people would be content. This, however, was a great mistake. When vessels containing tea arrived in the harbors of New York, Philadelphia, and other cities, they were not allowed to land their cargoes. In Boston the vessel was boarded by a party of men disguised as Indians, and the tea thrown into the water. This so angered the English Government that in 1774 a bill passed Parliament which forbade any vessels to enter Boston Harbor for the purpose of trading. This last act aroused all the colonies, for if the English Government could take away the trade from Boston, it could take it away from all other ports, and thus ruin the colonies. A second Colonial Congress was held in Philadelphia, in September, 1774, and the colonies decided to aid Massachusetts in her resistance. When this news reached England, ten thousand soldiers were sent out to General Gage, with directions to put down the rebellion by force, and the assembly in that colony was ordered to cease all action. Instead of obeying, they voted to raise twelve thousand men for their own defense.

The War.—1775.—General Gage's first movement was to seize the arms and ammunition in Boston, but the citizens quietly removed them to Concord. To capture or destroy these Major Pitcairn was sent on the night of the 18th of April, 1775. But the patriots were aroused by Paul Revere and William Dawes, who rode from Boston through the country a little in advance of the British, and when Pitcairn reached Lexington, he found a few men ready to meet him. He commanded them to disperse, and when they refused, fired upon them, wounding several. He then marched toward Concord. Here the provincials were collecting so rapidly that the British, after a slight contest, retreated toward Boston, while all along the road a steady fire was kept up by the patriots from behind fences, houses, and barns, inflicting such loss upon the retreating troops that if aid had not reached them from Boston, they would have been utterly destroyed. The news of the battle of Lexington sped through the country with such rapidity and effect that in a few days there was an army of twenty thousand men around Boston.

On the 9th of May Ethan Allen of Vermont led an attack against Fort Ticonderoga for the purpose of getting possession of its large quantity of military stores, and so forcible was the attack that the commander surrendered immediately. Two days later a successful attack was made upon Crown Point.

On the 25th of May Generals Howe, Clinton, and Burgoyne reached Boston, bringing with them more English troops. The Americans immediately seized and fortified Bunker Hill, on the peninsula of Charlestown, opposite Boston. On the night of the 16th of June one thousand provincials under Col. Prescott quietly fortified Breed's Hill, a little nearer the city. When, on the morning of the 17th, the British found them in possession, they began a fierce cannonade, and about noon landed three thousand men to attack the American works. Twice the British ascended the hill, and twice the Americans drove them back. But now their ammunition gave out, and therefore at the third attack the Americans were obliged to retreat. The British loss was over a thousand; the American, one hundred and fifteen and over three hundred wounded. Among the killed was General Warren.

In the meantime the Congress at Philadelphia had been led to see the need of raising an army and of appointing a commander-in-chief. For this office George Washington of Virginia was selected. We have already seen the part that Washington had taken in the French and Indian War. When that war closed, he was a member of the Virginia Assembly, and afterward a member of the Colonial Congress. He was now chosen to lead the country through its greatest struggle. All the colonies had not yet decided to break off all allegiance to England; but only wanted to compel the king to give them just treatment, and they had lately sent a last appeal asking this. Congress voted that twenty thousand men should be raised, and Washington went to work to organize an army. An expedition was sent against Canada, which resulted in the capture of St. Johns and Montreal. Richard Montgomery and Benedict Arnold made an attack on Quebec; but found the city so well defended that the Americans were badly defeated, and were obliged to withdraw step by step from Canada. The greatest loss of the expedition was the death of Montgomery, who was killed as his troops were retreating.

1776.—All winter the British held possession of Boston, and Washington kept his army just outside the city, waiting till he should think his force strong enough to expel the enemy. Early in the spring of 1776 he ordered General Thomas to fortify Dorchester Heights, on the south side of Boston—a site that overlooked the city. Lord Howe ordered Percy to attack the Heights from the harbor side; but a storm prevented this, and Howe, without making any further attempt, withdrew, and left Massachusetts in the hands of the Americans.

Washington suspected that Howe would sail for New York, and sent General Sullivan to reinforce Lee, already there, promising to join them himself as soon as possible. Fortifications were built on the heights on the Brooklyn side of the river, and on New York opposite, and recruits were summoned from all directions.

Meanwhile the attention of the British was turned to another quarter. The governor of Carolina thought that that colony might easily be reduced, and a force was sent from England for that purpose. Clinton met this force at Wilmington, and took command. But active preparations had been made to oppose them. Charleston was fortified against the land forces, and a fort was erected on Sullivan's Island in the harbor, by which Colonel Moultrie, the commander, hoped to keep out the fleet. The British appeared on the 31st of May, but did not make an attack until the 28th of June. Then the land and naval forces acted together. Such a fire opened upon Clinton's land forces that they were compelled to withdraw, and all the afternoon a fierce fire was kept up between Fort Sullivan and the two hundred guns of the fleet. The British guns did little harm, for the shot fell into the soft palmetto wood of which the fort was built, and most of the shells fell into the marsh and sand of the interior. Once the flag was shot down. Instantly Sergeant Jasper sprang over the wall and set it up again. In the evening the enemy, giving up all hope of taking South Carolina, withdrew and sailed for New York. The fort on Sullivan's Island was renamed Fort Moultrie, after its brave defender.

While these events were taking place, George the Third had sent his reply to the appeal of the colonies; had declared that he would listen to nothing until they should submit to his authority, and announced his intention of reducing them by arms. He was, moreover, raising troops by hiring the subjects of some of the smaller German states. His refusal to listen to their appeal put an end to all indecision, and by the end of June the colonies were ready to sever all connection with the mother country. The Continental Congress was in session at Philadelphia, and there, on the 7th of June, Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, declared that the colonies ought to be absolved from all allegiance to the British crown. Active discussion followed this, and on the 11th of the month, five members—Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, and Robert R. Livingston—were appointed to prepare a formal Declaration of Independence. This was done, and the resolutions were adopted by Congress on the Fourth of July. Copies of the Declaration were sent throughout the country, and read to the army. From all quarters came expressions of the joy to which it gave rise.

Preparations were still going on to receive an attack upon New York. At the end of June Howe arrived from Halifax—whither he had gone upon leaving Boston—and landed his troops upon Staten Island. Here he was joined by Admiral Howe, and later by the Hessian allies. The British force consisted of at least thirty thousand men, well armed, many of whom had seen service, and under the command of experienced officers. The American force under Washington was smaller, with scanty supply of arms and ammunition, and few of its number had had any experience in war.

After trying to bring the Americans to terms without fighting, the British crossed the bay to Gravesend on Long Island, on the 22d of August. From this point the British marched in three divisions on the 27th. Their first encounter was with Stirling, and was without decided result. But, through the neglect of General Putnam, certain points had been left unguarded, and the main army under Sullivan was suddenly attacked front and rear. After a desperate fight some few escaped, but numbers were taken prisoners. The division under Cornwallis now pressed after Stirling, and captured the general himself and a number of his men. The rest succeeded in reaching the American lines. Washington crossed from New York during the battle, but could give no aid. All that he could do was to try to save what was left of the army. He supposed that the British would follow up the defeated troops. But instead they remained inactive the day after the battle, and during the fog which succeeded on the 29th Washington silently withdrew his shattered forces across the river to New York, and afterward went further up the island to Harlem Heights.

On the 15th of September the British landed a little above New York, and routed a party of Americans in a skirmish. After several skirmishes of little importance a battle was fought at White Plains on the 28th. The Americans were driven from one position to another, and night came on before any decisive result. Howe returned to New York and Washington withdrew to North Castle. Both armies were much weakened by this action.

Howe now turned toward the Hudson, and Washington, fearing that he meant to enter New Jersey and proceed to Philadelphia, left a force under Lee at North Castle and another at Fort Washington, on the east side of the Hudson, and crossed over to Fort Lee on the west side. Howe followed. Fort Washington was taken, and the enemy crossed the river. Washington abandoned Fort Lee, and retreated through New Jersey, his army growing smaller as he went, closely pursued by the British. On the 8th of December Washington reached Trenton and crossed the Delaware. The British encamped at Trenton, to wait for the river to freeze over before attempting to cross ; for Washington had taken care that no boats should be at hand for the use of the enemy. The British, feeling confident in their strength, and assured that their defeated foes could not prevent their march into the capital, divided their forces so that Cornwallis occupied Princeton, and two thousand Hessians under Rahl lay at Trenton, which was but poorly defended. Washington saw in this the opportunity for an attack. His force had been strengthened by recruits, and the troops which he had left under Lee in New York. Several times he had ordered Lee to join him, but his orders had been so slowly obeyed that Lee himself fell into the hands of the British. Sullivan, who had been exchanged, then took command and eagerly hastened to Washington. The night of the 25th of December was chosen for the attack upon Trenton. The Delaware was so blocked with floating ice that the passage was delayed several hours. When it had been effected, the Americans in two divisions fell upon the city from different directions, and so surprised the Hessians that they were compelled to surrender. That evening Washington took across the Delaware with him more than nine hundred prisoners. This victory filled the nation with joy.

1777.—On the 13th of December Washington took up a position at Trenton, and on the 2d of January, 1777, Cornwallis arrived from Princeton. Washington, fearing defeat, and aware that a hasty retreat under fire of the enemy would destroy his army, determined to escape in another way. There were two roads from Trenton to Princeton, one direct, which the British held, and one circuitous. This latter the American army took, leaving their camp-fires burning to deceive Cornwallis, and entered Princeton just as three regiments were leaving to join the main army at Trenton. A severe contest took place, in which the Americans succeeded in repulsing the British. Cornwallis, angry at the escape of the enemy, hastened back to Princeton, and found that the Americans had gone to Morristown, where they remained for the rest of the winter.

The opening of the year 1777 brought encouragement from abroad. Through the exertions of Franklin and others, who had been sent to Europe, money and arms were raised in France. Among the private men who thus aided the Americans was the Marquis of Lafayette, who fitted out an expedition and reached America in April. He offered to serve as a volunteer, and Congress gave him the rank of major-general.

On the 25th of April, Tryon, formerly governor of New York, proceeded against Danbury, Connecticut, and destroyed some stores; but he was attacked by Wooster and Arnold on his retreat, and badly defeated. An attack made upon the British stores at Sag Harbor was more successful. In July Colonel Barton made a raid upon the house in Newport where the British General Prescott lodged, and took him prisoner.

In May Washington left Morristown, and took up his position within ten miles of the enemy at New Brunswick. Howe brought reinforcements to Cornwallis, and an attack was made on the 25th of June. Washington was obliged to withdraw, but did so without loss. The British crossed over to Staten Island, so that New Jersey was left in the hands of the patriots.

Burgoyne's Campaign.—The most important action of this year was the campaign in the north. General Burgoyne led an expedition from Canada for the purpose of getting control of the Hudson, and so cutting off communication between New England and the Middle States. The first event of the campaign was the seizure of Fort Ticonderoga. This fort was commanded by General St. Clair, with three thousand men. But, as the British took possession of a hill overlooking the fort, the garrison abandoned it and withdrew into Vermont. The British pursued and overtook them at Hubbardton ; but they met such a fire as compelled them to give up the pursuit. The Americans then fell back to Fort Edward, where General Schuyler took command, and led them to the mouth of the Mohawk River. While on his way southward in pursuit, Burgoyne sent Colonel Baum with a few hundred men into Vermont to capture the stores at Bennington. The militia under Colonel Stark completely routed them, with a loss of one hundred and forty killed and wounded, and seven hundred prisoners.

When Burgoyne started on his expedition, he sent a force of Canadians and Indians to capture Fort Schuyler. When the news of their coming spread abroad, the militia of the neighborhood under General Herkimer prepared to assist the small garrison at the fort. This force of militia fell into an ambush, and would have been destroyed if the garrison had not rushed out to their assistance. The sudden force of this attack completely routed the enemy.

The news of this repulse reached Burgoyne just after the battle of Bennington, and made him undecided as to the best thing to do. The American troops were gathering from all quarters, cheered by late successes, and General Gates was at the head of about nine thousand men at Stillwater. On the 14th of September Burgoyne took position at Saratoga, and four days later encamped within two miles of Gates. On the 19th a battle took place, which had reached no decided result when night fell, and both armies retired to their camps. More than two weeks passed before any further action took place.

Meantime, Burgoyne was falling short of provisions, and his Indian and Canadian allies were deserting. On the other hand, Gates's forces were increasing. At last, assured that some of the American troops would be called off to protect the Hudson from an anticipated attack by Clinton, Burgoyne began a second battle at Stillwater, on the 7th of October. He was badly defeated, and driven from his position. In this battle General Fraser was killed, and many others of Burgoyne's bravest officers and men. On the American side Arnold distinguished himself by his reckless daring. The Americans pursued the defeated enemy as far as Saratoga, and then Burgoyne, finding himself hemmed in, surrendered. On the 17th of October, his army, numbering about five thousand eight hundred men, became prisoners of war, and a large quantity of arms and other valuable stores passed into the hands of the Americans. The success of the army in the north was the more grateful to the colonists, because the army under Washington was suffering reverses.

Washington's Campaign.—In the latter part of July, Washington saw Howe move his fleet and troops from Staten Island. Suspecting that he was on his way to Philadelphia Washington marched rapidly thither. When Howe found that the Americans had control of Delaware Bay, he sailed south to the Chesapeake, and on the 25th of August landed his troops, and marched toward Philadelphia. Washington's forces were stationed on the Brandywine, where he hoped so to defeat the enemy as to prevent their reaching the capital. But General Sullivan, who was in command of one division, mistook the movements of the enemy, and Washington was misled by contradictory reports; so that an attack on the 11th of September resulted in the defeat of the Americans. Fully a thousand men were killed, wounded, and missing. Next day Washington led the troops back toward Philadelphia, and took position at Germantown. On the 15th he marched toward the British camp, but a storm prevented a battle. Howe, after a series of maneuvers intended to mislead Washington, entered Philadelphia on the 26th of September. Upon this, Congress removed first to Lancaster, and then to York, where it continued to meet until the capital was abandoned by the British the next summer.

One of Howe's first movements was to send a large division of his army against Forts Mifflin and Mercer on the Delaware. Washington, thinking that this would be an excellent time to attack the remaining forces, which were stationed at Germantown, moved his army in three divisions and fell upon the British. At first the attack seemed successful; but a party of British got possession of a stone house, and kept up such a steady fire from it that the Americans were forced to retreat with great loss.

On the 22d of October, Fort Mifflin was attacked by the British fleet. The garrison held out as long as possible, and then fled to Fort Mercer, which had already been unsuccessfully attacked by the Hessians under Donop. Cornwallis was sent to make a second attack; and although General Greene took reinforcements to the garrison, the British force was so much larger than the American, that in November the fort was abandoned, and the British left in control of the Delaware.

Howe failed to draw the Americans into another engagement, and went into winter-quarters at Philadelphia. Washington retired to Valley Forge, where the soldiers suffered most severely all winter for the want of food, clothes, and every other necessary. Many deserted, and those who remained needed all their patriotism and all the power of their commander to make their condition bearable. Some of Washington's enemies blamed him for the reverses his army had sustained, and strove to have him removed, and Lee or Gates put in his place; but the army and the greater part of the people remained true to him.

During this winter the Americans received further encouragement from Europe. Baron von Steuben, a Prussian who had fought under Frederick the Great, arrived, and proved of great assistance in teaching and drilling the army. The French government, too, yielding to the urgent requests of Franklin and the other agents, made a treaty with the United States. In consequence, England tried to appease the colonies by repealing all the offensive laws. But she would not recognize the independence of the colonies ; and nothing else would now satisfy them.

CHAPTER IX.

THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR—CONTINUED.

1778.—No important action took place until the summer of this year. Then the British, fearing the occupation of the Delaware by a French fleet, left Philadelphia for New York. On the 18th of June the army of fourteen thousand men, under Sir Henry Clinton, began its march through New Jersey. As soon as Washington learned this, he marched in pursuit ; and on the 27th came to within five miles of the enemy near Monmouth. General Lee was ordered on the 28th to attack the enemy, which he did ; but a part of his detachment, mistaking one of his movements, began a retreat pursued by the British. Washington came up in time to rally the troops, and, rebuking Lee for his bad generalship, ordered him to the rear, and himself took the command. The contest continued until night, and the advantage was with the Americans ; but before morning Clinton, evidently fearing defeat, removed his forces, and continued his march. Washington followed, and took position at White Plains.

In July a French fleet under D'Estaing arrived at Newport Harbor. General Pigot, with six thousand British and Hessians, held the town; and Sullivan, in command of ten thousand Americans, was awaiting a favorable opportunity to attack him. The two armies, French and American, arranged to make a united attack on the 10th of August. On the 9th Howe's fleet appeared, and D'Estaing went out to meet it. A storm separated the fleets, and D'Estaing was obliged to put into Boston for repairs. In November he sailed for the West Indies without having been of any assistance to the Americans. Sullivan, however, determined to make the proposed attack, and besieged Newport. But he was obliged to retreat. The British pursued him to the northern part of the island, where they were repulsed with great loss. Then Sullivan, learning that Clinton was on his way with reinforcements, retreated to the mainland.

In July, Major Butler, a Tory, led a company of British and Indians into Wyoming Valley, Pennsylvania, attacked the fort, and obliged the garrison to surrender. They then fell upon the helpless people, and robbed and massacred all on whom they could lay their hands. A similar massacre took place in Cherry Valley, New York, during which most of the houses were burned, and many people killed or driven from their homes. In revenge for these cruelties an expedition went from Virginia against the Indians on the western frontier, which resulted in the capture of several important posts.

In December, Clinton sent two thousand men under Colonel Campbell to get possession of Georgia. The Americans, under General Robert Howe, were surprised at Savannah, and obliged to retreat, losing thereby a great part of their force. The remainder crossed into South Carolina, took possession of Charleston, and left Georgia in the hands of the British.

1779.—Another expedition was led by Tryon into

Connecticut, in the early spring of this year, to destroy some works. After doing this, he burned the village of West Greenwich, and then went back to New York. In July he sailed for New Haven with about twenty-five hundred men, and captured the town. Then he plundered and burned the towns of Fairfield, East Haven, and Norwalk.

In May, Clinton had approached Stony Point on the Hudson where the Americans were building a fort, and had driven them from the place. Washington determined not to lose so important a post, and chose General Wayne to retake it. On the 15th of July Wayne led his troops up the side of the steep hill, and so silently was the approach made that the sentinel at the summit had only just given the alarm when the patriots scaled the walls and summoned the garrison to surrender. Over five hundred prisoners and valuable stores passed into the hands of Wayne. These he secured, and then destroyed the fort. Three days afterward the British garrison at Paulus Hook was surprised and taken by Lee.

In August, a fleet which had been fitted out by Massachusetts, was captured by the British while besieging a post on the Penobscot.

Meanwhile, the war in the South went on. While Colonel Boyd, with a party of Tories, was on his way to Augusta to join Colonel Campbell, he was attacked and defeated by some militia under Colonel Pickens. In March, General Lincoln, now in command in the South, ordered Colonel Ashe to proceed against the British on their way from Augusta to Savannah. He was surprised at Brier Creek by General Prevost, and his small army scattered; a few only reached the main army. General Lincoln rallied his forces, and in May was on his way to Savannah by way of Augusta. On the 12th, General Prevost appeared before Charleston, and ordered its surrender. This General Moultrie refused ; and Prevost, learning that Lincoln was coming to the relief of the city, retreated, and, after fortifying Beaufort, returned to Savannah.

In the early part of September, D'Estaing came from the West Indies with six thousand men, to aid Lincoln in an attack upon Savannah. When, after considerable delay, Lincoln arrived, the siege was begun but without success. On the 8th of October they determined to make an assault upon the city as their last hope of gaining it. After an hour's most severe fighting, the assailants were driven back with fearful loss. D'Estaing embarked immediately for France, and Lincoln retired to Charleston.

While the patriots were thus being defeated on land, a more encouraging event was taking place at sea. In September Paul Jones, with a few French and American vessels, fell in with some British merchant ships and two men-of-war, off the coast of England. For more than an hour the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis were engaged in the most desperate battle. When both vessels were shattered by shot they were lashed together, and the mariners fought hand to hand until the Serapis struck her colors. Then Jones removed what was left of his men to the captured vessel, and the Bon Homme Richard was left to sink. The other man-of-war was captured. But his victory cost Jones most of his men ; for only seventy-five were left out of three hundred and seventy-five.

Thus closed the fifth year of the war, and independence seemed as far off as ever. The treasury was bankrupt, and Congress had no power to raise money by taxes. The soldiers were ill-fed and worse paid. The French, from whom so much had been expected, had so far rendered little effective assistance. And England showed her determination to carry on the struggle by raising over a hundred thousand more troops, and twenty million pounds for expenses.

1780.—The most active operations of this year were carried on in the South. In the North, the British, under Knyphausen, made two unsuccessful marches from New York into New Jersey. The patriots were greatly encouraged by the arrival of six thousand troops under Count Rochambeau, and a squadron under Admiral de Ternay. But Washington's army was unable to unite with these for any immediate action, although plans were laid for the future.

In February, a British squadron appeared before Charleston under Admiral Arbuthnot, bringing from New York Sir Henry Clinton, and five thousand men to force the South into submission. Clinton landed below the harbor, and led his forces north of the city. A few days later, the fleet passed Fort Moultrie in safety, and anchored in the harbor. Lincoln, who had received reinforcements from Virginia, refused to surrender, and the British began the siege. In order to keep a way open for retreat, Lincoln sent out General Huger with three hundred men to raise recruits from the militia. Scarcely had they left Charleston when Tarleton fell upon them, completely routing the whole force. The city was now surrounded, and Lincoln was forced to surrender. The British took possession on the 12th of May. Expeditions were now sent out to disperse the militia and to take possession of important posts. Everywhere the successes of the British were marked by the cruel treatment of the people; so that, although the most important parts of the State came under their control, the greater portion of the people were only waiting for the time to come when they could throw off their authority. Some of the more daring spirits fled into North Carolina, and formed themselves into bands, which annoyed the British by their petty attacks. Of these, two bands under Sumter and Marion, were the most famous. These parties would fall upon detached bodies of British at the most unexpected times and places, and often inflict considerable loss. During the whole campaign of 1780, the British never felt quite secure from them.

Congress appointed General Gates to succeed Lincoln in the South; and, with a strong force of regular troops and such militia as would join him on his way, he crossed into North Carolina. Hearing this, Lord Rawdon took up his position at Camden, in the northern part of South Carolina, and Cornwallis hastened from Charleston. The Americans advanced into South Carolina until they were within fourteen miles of Camden. Each leader, intending to surprise the other, ordered his army forward, and at dawn, on the 16th of August, the two armies met. The Americans had the stronger force, and occupied a good position; but want of courage and firmness on the part of some of the leaders, and of experience on the part of some of the troops, gave the advantage to the British. The Continental troops under De Kalb fought long and bravely, but were at last overpowered and driven back. De Kalb himself was mortally wounded in the contest. The shattered army retreated to Charlotte, North Carolina, and afterward to Salisbury. A few days after the battle of Camden, Sumter, who had led a detachment from the main army to intercept supplies, was attacked and badly defeated by Tarleton.

Meantime, Colonel Campbell, with a thousand men, surprised a party of British at King's Mountain, and compelled them, after a desperate battle, to surrender. The close of this year saw Cornwallis still master in the South, and making cruel use of his power to induce or compel allegiance to the king.

Arnold's Treason.—The whole country was greatly shocked in the autumn of 1780, by the news that Benedict Arnold, the brave patriot, who had distinguished himself in the earlier struggles of the war, was a traitor to his country. He had, in 1779, been charged by Congress with abusing his trust as commandant of Philadelphia, and had been tried and removed from office. In July, 1780, he obtained the command at West Point. This place he proposed giving up into the hands of the British. In order to complete the arrangements, Major John André went up from New York, and met Arnold near Haverstraw, who, giving the password, took him within the American lines. The next day all arrangements were made. West Point was to be surrendered, and Arnold was to receive in return the rank of brigadier in the British army and ten thousand pounds. At night André crossed the river, and set out by land for New York. When he reached Tarrytown, he was stopped by three patriots named John Paulding, David Williams, and Isaac Van Wart, who searched him, and found concealed in his stockings, papers containing plans of West Point, and instructions for its attack. Scorning his offers of payment if they would let him go, they took him to the commander at North Castle, who notified Arnold of his capture. Arnold at once made his escape down the river, and was received into the British army as arranged. André was tried, condemned as a spy, and executed on the 2d of October.

1781.—Early in this year some of the troops in New Jersey, roused by their prolonged sufferings and the neglect of Congress, revolted and marched toward Philadelphia, resisting all General Wayne's efforts to appease them. But even in their anger against Congress, they were too loyal to listen to the proposals of British agents to desert. They were promised food, clothing, and freedom from military service; but in reply they seized the proposers and gave them up as spies. Congress praised their action, and yielded to some of their demands. When another brigade mutinied a little later, General Lee put down the disturbance by force. But Congress, realizing the necessity of providing more carefully for the needs of the men upon whom the whole cause greatly depended, took measures to raise means to do so. At this time the Bank of North America was founded; and, to insure the credit of the Government, Robert Morris and some others pledged their private fortunes.

The opening month of 1781 saw active preparations going on in the South. Greene, who had been appointed to the command, no sooner assumed it than he set about reorganizing the broken forces. The troops were divided into two divisions. Early in January, Morgan, who at the head of the western division had gone into the northwestern district of South Carolina to arouse the militia and put down the Tories, was attacked by Tarleton near Cowpens. Aware of the enemy's approach, Morgan had taken a good position, and met the attack firmly. Tarleton was sure of success, when Colonel Washington made so desperate a charge that the British turned and fled, leaving over five hundred prisoners and some ammunition in the hands of the victors.

As soon as Cornwallis heard of Tarleton's defeat he hastened from his camp on the Catawba in pursuit of Morgan. But Greene, too, had heard the news. Hastening to Morgan he took command, and led a retreat to Charlotte, in the meantime summoning the other division under Huger to meet him. Across the State they marched, closely pursued by Cornwallis. Twice they barely escaped him. Twice the British were detained by swollen streams, over which the Americans had passed in safety. At last the Americans crossed into Virginia, and were safe. Here Greene was reinforced by Virginia militia, and, as his troops now numbered over four thousand men, he resolved to risk a battle. Accordingly he advanced to Guilford Court House, and awaited the enemy. On the 15th of March the armies met. Although in possession of an advantageous position, Greene's divisions seem to have been unwisely posted ; and in the opening contest it happened that some raw American troops were opposed by some of Cornwallis's best. So that, although the Americans fought bravely, they were driven from the field and forced to retreat. But in effect the defeat was a victory, for Cornwallis soon after left for Virginia.

Greene now advanced toward Camden, where Lord Rawdon was stationed with a strong force. On the 25th of April, Rawdon made a successful attack. Next month, however, he removed his force to Eutaw Springs ; and one post after another was given up to the Americans. At length, in August, Greene advanced against Orangeburg, one of the few posts remaining to the British. Finding it abandoned, he followed to Eutaw Springs where one of the fiercest battles of the war took place. It resulted in the retreat of the British into Charleston ; and as, during the same interval, St. Clair had succeeded in driving them from North Carolina, their power in the South was evidently at an end.

Cornwallis, on reaching Virginia, found Arnold in supreme command. This general had been placed by Clinton at the head of sixteen thousand men, and had gone into Virginia to aid the cause of his country's enemy. Twice Washington had planned his capture, and had failed. When Cornwallis arrived he showed his contempt for the traitor by ordering him out of the State. Arnold next received a force with which he went against New London. Capturing the town, he forced the garrison to surrender, and allowed many of them to be massacred.

From May to July, Cornwallis spent his time laying waste the country, and destroying property in Virginia, closely watched meantime by Lafayette, who was, however, too weak to meet the enemy in the open field. At last, obeying Clinton's orders, Cornwallis fortified himself at Yorktown. Lafayette knew that De Grasse was expected shortly with a fleet, and saw that with this fleet to block the mouth of the York River, and a force sufficiently powerful to oppose him on the peninsula, Cornwallis would be completely at their mercy. Accordingly he urged Washington to join him, which he did in August with his entire force of allied troops. Meantime, the looked-for fleet had arrived, and so, too, had a French fleet from Newport, bringing the ordnance for a siege. Clinton, whom Cornwallis had besought for aid, had been so sure that Washington was planning an attack upon New York that he not only refused to send any more troops to Virginia, but ordered Cornwallis to be ready to send him aid if needed. At last, when informed that Washington had moved south, a fleet was sent under Graves to the Chesapeake. This the French fleet attacked, and compelled to return to New York.

On the 28th of September, the forces, consisting of seven thousand French and nine thousand Americans, were around Yorktown. On the 6th of October cannonading began, and continued without interruption until the 14th, when an assault was made which carried the outer works. On the 16th, the British, making a sortie, were driven back, and Cornwallis, aware that he could neither hold out nor retreat, proposed to surrender. On the 18th the terms of surrender were signed; and on the 19th, his army of over seven thousand men laid down their arms in the presence of the victorious troops.

On the 23d the news reached Philadelphia, and Congress went in a body to the Luthéran church and gave thanks. A great throb of joy went through the land, for the power of Great Britain in the United States was ended forever.

In 1783 articles of peace were drawn up between Great Britain and the United States, of which the following were the terms: The independence of the United States was fully recognized ; all the territory south of the lakes and east of the Mississippi was given up to the United States ; while Great Britain retained Canada and Nova Scotia, and control of the St. Lawrence. Both countries were to have equal right to the fisheries at Newfoundland ; and Florida was ceded to Spain.

On the 25th of November the British evacuated New York. Nine days afterward, Washington took leave of his officers, and proceeded to Congress to resign his commission as commander-in-chief of the army.

CHAPTER X.

THE ADMINISTRATIONS.

IN 1754, Benjamin Franklin had proposed a union of the colonies, but his plan fell to the ground. Each colony regarded its own sovereignty as supreme, and was jealous of any general authority. During the Revolution, the need of a central power was sorely felt ; yet nothing but the greatest necessity urged the colonies to allow even a Continental Congress, and its action was constantly hampered by its want of power, for it could not compel the colonies to carry out its orders. In June, 1776, a committee appointed for that purpose drew up the Articles of Confederation, which Congress accepted in November, 1777. The legislatures of the various States proposed many amendments ; and these having been satisfactorily arranged, all the States but Maryland had adopted the Articles by February, 1779, and Maryland consented in 1781. But as soon as Congress met, it was evident that the new plan was not much better than the old one. An immense war debt was to be paid, and Congress could only request the States to raise money for that purpose. To this request some responded ; some did not. The country was in a most distressed condition, and it seemed as if the nation must come to ruin.

After three years of trial and difficulty a new plan was proposed. It was now more clearly seen what the needs of Congress were ; and Washington with some others suggested the calling of a convention at Annapolis, in 1786 ; but it did not meet for action until the 17th of May, 1787, and then met at Philadelphia. After long discussion Randolph proposed to set aside the old Articles, and adopt a new constitution. In September this was done, and the Constitution of the United States was sent to the several States for acceptance, on the condition that it should go into effect as soon as nine of them should ratify it. This was done in the following order : Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Georgia, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maryland, South Carolina, and New Hampshire. Then, after long debate, Virginia and New York. North Carolina did not ratify until 1789, and Rhode Island not until 1790.

The first Wednesday in January, 1789, was the day appointed for the election of the first president of the United States. There was but one man in the people's estimation for the office ; and when the ballots of the electors were counted, George Washington was unanimously elected president, and John Adams vice-president.

Washington's Administration.—1789-'97.
—The 4th of March was the day set apart for the inauguration of the president ; but it was not until the 30th of April that the event took place. Then, upon the balcony of the old City Hall, New York, Washington took the oath of office, and delivered his inaugural address before the Senate. He chose for his Cabinet, Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of Foreign Affairs ; Knox, Secretary of War ; Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, and John Jay, Chief Justice. Hamilton brought his genius to bear upon the most pressing question of the time, and presented to Congress a plan for the payment of all debts incurred by the war. Notwithstanding great opposition, his plan was accepted; taxes were imposed, and credit established. During this session, Congress selected Philadelphia as the seat of government for ten years, hoping before the expiration of that time to choose a permanent site for a capital. In 1791 the Bank of the United States was established, and in the autumn of the same year Vermont was admitted into the Union.

In 1787, the tract of country known as the Northwest Territory, which had in 1783 been ceded to the United States by the States to which it belonged, was organized. St. Clair was appointed military governor; and it was agreed that when it should be divided, not less than three nor more than five States should be made from it, and that no slavery should be allowed in them. In 1790, war broke out with the Miami Indians in this territory. Troops were sent out from Fort Washington (now Cincinnati), the capital of the territory, but were defeated and compelled to return to the fort. In 1791 the government sent troops to General St. Clair, and these also were defeated. St. Clair then resigned, and was succeeded by General Wayne, who, in 1793, after building a new fort and garrisoning an old one, sent proposals of peace to the Indians. When the Indians refused to accept these, he went against them, and so completely routed them that they were obliged to give up all claim to the territory from Fort Recovery, on one of the upper branches of the Wabash, to the mouth of the Great Miami River.

In 1792, Kentucky was admitted into the Union. In the fall of the same year the presidential election took place, and Washington and Adams were re-elected. Difficulties soon arose from the want of sympathy in State matters between some of the members of the cabinet. Two parties had arisen in the country. One, the Federalists, who were in favor of the new constitution, and the other, the Anti-Federalists, who opposed it. The leaders of the first party were Washington, Jay, and Hamilton; while Jefferson was the recognized head of the second. In 1794, Jefferson resigned his office; and in 1795, Hamilton also resigned.

In 1794, the distillers of whisky in Western Pennsylvania refused to pay the taxes which the government had imposed upon that article, and arose in arms against the tax officers. The president sent troops to put down the disturbance, but the rioters had disbanded before they arrived. This is known as the Whisky Riot.

Considerable damage was done in 1793 to American commerce by the seizure of trading vessels by British privateers. In consequence of which Jay was sent to England in 1794, to demand redress; and a treaty was concluded in November. Great hostility to this treaty existed in parts of the country, but it was ratified at last, and war was averted by England ceding certain Western posts to the United States. In 1795, by a treaty with Spain, the boundary between the United States and Florida was determined, and unrestricted use of the Mississippi insured. In the same year the government agreed to pay the Dey of Algiers a certain amount of money yearly, in order to prevent the seizure of American merchant vessels by the pirates of that country.

In 1796, Tennessee asked for and obtained admission into the Union. Before the elections this year, Washington declared his intention of not becoming a candidate for re-election. The division between the parties was stronger than before, for they differed not only upon the constitution, but also upon matters of State policy; especially upon those referring to the relations proper between the United States and France. The Anti-Federalists desired to take up the cause of the French Republic; while the Federalists desired America to be free from all alliance with foreign nations. Both parties put up their candidates—Adams, of the Federal, and Jefferson, of the Anti-Federal. Adams, receiving the greatest number of votes, became president, and Jefferson, receiving the next highest, became vice-president.

Adams' Administration.—1797–1801.—John Adams, the second president of the United States, had been a delegate from Massachusetts to the Colonial Congress, and one of the committee to draw up the Declaration of Independence. He was the first Minister to Great Britain from the United States as an independent government, and had served in other official capacities.

The French Revolution was now in progress, and a large part of the Americans, urged on by the French Minister, were anxious that the government should ally itself with the French Republic. The president, in spite of strong opposition, insisted upon strict neutrality. Whereupon the French Directory demanded an alliance, ordered its men-of-war to interfere with American commerce, and finally dismissed the American Minister from Paris. Gerry, Marshall, and Pinckney, were sent to Paris to attempt a settlement; but the Directory refused to receive them, unless a quarter million of dollars were first paid down as restitution for injuries which they pretended to have received by Jay's treaty with Great Britain. This the ambassadors refused, and they, too, were ordered to leave. In 1793, preparations were made for war. The army was organized, and a navy fitted out for the protection of American commerce. In the next year Admiral Truxton won renown by his services. On one occasion, he attacked and took a French man-of-war with a force vastly superior to his own ; and on another, his success was only prevented by a sudden storm.

The French Minister, Talleyrand, seeing these preparations, asked that some one might be sent to treat for peace. But, before an ambassador could reach Paris, Bonaparte had overthrown the Directory, and had made himself master of France. He was anxious for peace with America, seeing that otherwise she must ally herself with the greatest enemy of France, England. Accordingly peace was signed in September, 1800. The year 1800, the last of Adams' administration, was saddened by the death of Washington. Even those who had been opposed to him in some of his political views, mourned the loss of one who had ever been ready to lay aside everything at his country's call.

The strife between the political parties had increased with time and with the passage of some unpopular acts. Among these were the "Alien and Sedition Laws," the first of which gave the president power to remove from the country any foreigner who might be thought dangerous to the United States ; while the second interfered with the freedom of the press when it was directed against the government. The elections at the close of this year caused, therefore, great excitement. The Federalists offered Adams and Pinckney as their candidates ; the Democrats (as they were now called) offered Jefferson and Burr. As the two latter received an equal number of votes, the election was referred to the House of Representatives, where, after repeated balloting, Jefferson was chosen president, and Aaron Burr vice-president.

Jefferson's Administration.—1801-1809.—Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, the well-known author of the Declaration of Independence, began his administration by removing from office many whose political principles did not agree with his own—a precedent which has been followed by every president who has succeeded him. He next caused some of the unpopular laws of the preceding administration to be repealed.

The changes in the West were among the most important events of this administration. In 1802 the state of Ohio was withdrawn from the Northwest Territory and admitted into the Union ; and the remainder of the tract became known as the Indiana Territory. At the same time the land from Georgia westward to the Mississippi was formed into the Mississippi Territory. In 1800, Spain had ceded the Territory of Louisiana to France ; and now Napoleon, finding that it would be difficult to manage a colony so far away, listened willingly to proposals from the United States to purchase it. Accordingly, for the sum of about fourteen million dollars, the United States came into possession of the immense tract of land having for its boundary on the north the forty-ninth degree of latitude ; on the east the Mississippi River and Florida ; on the south the Gulf of Mexico ; and on the west the Sabine River, the Red River, the mountains north of the Arkansas River, until the forty-second degree of latitude was reached, when the Rocky Mountains became the western boundary.*

In 1803, the government sent a naval force to the Mediterranean to protect American commerce, which was suffering at the hands of the states on the north coast of Africa. In February, 1804, Commodore Decatur, in the Intrepid, made a brave capture of the frigate Philadelphia, which had been taken by the Tripolitans the year previous. Slipping cautiously into the harbor of Tripoli, he lashed the Intrepid to the Philadelphia, and boarded her, overpowering the crew ; after which he set fire to her, and then escaped without losing a man, though under heavy fire from the guns of the fort. Commodore Preble arrived in July, and commenced the siege of Tripoli ; and, with the aid of the deposed brother of the sovereign, brought the Tripolitans to terms. A treaty was concluded in 1805.

In the summer of 1804, Burr, the vice-president, angered by Hamilton's frequent interference in his ambitious aims, challenged him, and, in the duel which followed, killed him. Fleeing from New York, where public opinion was strong against him, Burr went west, and two years afterward was accused of being concerned in a conspiracy to raise troops to get control of Mexico, and then to erect a new republic in the southwest. As there was not sufficient evidence to convict him, he was acquitted. But owing to his unpopularity, which was now very great, he went into voluntary exile.

Meantime Jefferson was re-elected in 1804, and George Clinton of New York made vice-president. The government was at this time greatly troubled by the state of American commerce. France and England were at war; and, in order to inflict the more injury upon each other, each forbade neutral vessels to enter the ports of the other. In May, 1806, England declared France to be in a state of blockade—that is, she placed vessels outside the ports of France to prevent trading vessels from entering or leaving them. As the neutral vessels knew nothing of this, they were captured. In November of the same year France declared the British Isles in a state of blockade, and French vessels were at hand to capture unwary ships. Next, Great Britain claimed the right of boarding American vessels, and seizing all persons who had been born in her territories, and impressing them into her service. At last, on the 22d of June, 1807, the British man-of-war Leopard approached and hailed the American frigate Chesapeake when off the coast of Virginia. The officers went on board and insisted on searching the vessel. This was refused, and, before the ship could be made ready for action, the Leopard fired upon her and compelled her surrender. This roused both president and people. Reparation was demanded, which was promised but never made. Then the president issued the Embargo, which prohibited British vessels from entering any American port. But this also prevented American vessels from passing out, and, with two other acts of the same time, came near destroying her commerce. These two acts were, first, the British Orders in Council, which forbade all trade with France and her allies ; and, second, Napoleon's Milan Decree, which forbade all trade with England and her allies.

During this administration Robert Fulton applied steam to purposes of navigation, and in 1807 launched the first steamboat on the Hudson River. He also invented a torpedo for use in naval warfare.

CHAPTER XI.

THE ADMINISTRATIONS—CONTINUED.—WAR OF 1812.

Madison's Administration. — 1809-1817.—James Madison found himself at the head of a nation in troublous times. France had removed all her restrictions on American commerce ; but England continued her overbearing measures. Six thousand American citizens had been seized and forced into the British service, and the people would bear this no longer. Although the president would have preferred to settle the matter, if possible, without war, those who served under him were violent in their hatred of Great Britain. In November, 1811, Congress met, and it was evident that war must come. And yet it seemed a daring thing to propose : for America had no army, and a very inferior navy, manned by inexperienced seamen ; while Great Britain had an immense army in the field which Napoleon's advance on Russia had left without fear of immediate action, and a large and finely-manned navy.

But two special acts had roused the people. In May, 1811, Commodore Rodgers, cruising off the coast of Virginia, hailed a vessel, and in reply received a succession of shots. Rodgers replied in the same way, and silenced his enemy, which proved to be the British ship Little Belt. In February, 1812, a conspiracy between Great Britain and the governor of Canada for the destruction of the United States was discovered. Some of the New England States were opposed to the Democratic administration, and the conspirators hoped to win over these States to secede. But they signally failed, and the discovery of the attempt only strengthened the feeling of hostility.

In 1812, while war was pending, Louisiana was admitted into the Union. On the 19th, of June the president issued a proclamation declaring war against Great Britain, and Congress ordered twenty-five thousand regular troops and fifty thousand volunteers, and called upon the States to protect their coasts and harbors with their militia. Henry Dearborn, of Massachusetts, was appointed commander-in-chief.

In 1810, a war occurred with the Indians in the North-west. Jealous of the advance of the white man, the Indian tribes were aroused by Tecumseh to lay aside all jealousy of each other, and unite for the expulsion of the intruders. When Harrison, governor of the Territory, offered to buy their lands, Tecumseh refused to sign the treaty, and determined to get back what had already been ceded. Harrison then decided to enforce the treaty, and advanced to the mouth of the Tippecanoe. Here, while waiting for a conference with the chiefs, the troops were suddenly attacked by the Indians. The attack was, however, promptly met and the Indians were routed; after which Tecumseh gave up his design, and allied himself with the British in Canada.

The first action of the war with England was a movement by the Americans to overawe the Indians on the North-west frontier, and to invade Canada. For this purpose General William Hull advanced with twelve hundred Ohio volunteers toward Detroit. The vessel containing his stores and dispatches was seized on the way by the British commander at Malden, who had been informed of the declaration of war. Hull then determined upon attacking Malden, and on the 12th of July crossed the Detroit. But before preparations were completed, news came of the loss of the post on the Mackinaw, and the defeat of a body of reinforcements on its way to him. He, therefore, recrossed to Detroit; and when the British, who had been strengthened, advanced upon him there in August, Hull, overestimating his enemy's force, offered to surrender.

The day before this occurred, a body of Indians fell upon Fort Dearborn (Chicago), and, forcing its surrender, killed or took prisoners most of its people.

An attack made from New York upon Queens-town in October, was at first successful, but the place was retaken by the British very soon afterward. Another party in November crossed from near Buffalo, but were recalled by their commander.

But while the Americans were so unsuccessful on land, their navy was winning a reputation for itself. On the 19th of August, the American frigate Constitution fell in with the Guerriere off the coast of Massachusetts. The Guerriere opened fire, but the Constitution poured such a broadside upon her that she was compelled to strike her flag; after which, her prisoners were taken off, and she was burnt. On the 18th of October, the Wasp, under Captain Jones, between Cape Cod and the Bermudas, met six British merchant-men and the Frolic, which offered battle. After a furious fire the vessels came close together, and the Wasp's men boarded the Frolic and lowered her flag. Almost immediately, however, the British ship Poictiers came upon the scene of action, and carried off both the vessels. On the 25th of the same month, the United States, under Commodore Decatur, attacked and captured the Macedonian near the Canary Islands. On the 26th, the Essex sailed from Delaware, and, later in the winter, took a British ship with about fifty thousand dollars on board. Then she sailed for the Pacific, where, after doing great harm to British merchantmen throughout 1813, she was herself captured in the spring of 1814.

In the autumn of 1812, Madison was reëlected, and Elbridge Gerry, of Massachusetts, elected vice-president. Measures for strengthening the army and navy were passed in Congress.

1813.—In January, an army under General Winchester undertook to regain the points lost by Hull in the previous campaign. An attack by an advance force upon Frenchtown, where a body of British and Indians were posted, resulted in the capture of the town. Here they were joined by the main army, and here the British, in a few days, attacked them. After severe fighting, with great loss on both sides, Winchester advised surrender. Notwithstanding his promise of safety, Proctor left the wounded prisoners to be massacred by the Indians. On the 1st of May, two thousand British and Indians besieged General Harrison at Fort Meigs; and, but for a mistaken movement on the part of a division of reinforcements from Kentucky, the British would have been completely routed. As it was, Proctor was obliged to abandon the idea of taking the fort, and retreated to Malden. After three months he made another attempt, and again failed. He next made an attempt at Lower Sandusky. Here he also failed, and with great loss.

Up to this time the results had been unimportant. Little had been gained or lost; but now an attempt was made by the Americans to get control of Lake Erie, and so of its shores. This task was given to a young Rhode Island man, Oliver Perry. Under his direction, a small fleet of nine ships was built; and in September met the British fleet of six ships, commanded by Barclay, a skilled officer, at Put-in Bay. Perry, in his flag-ship, the Lawrence, began the attack. The Lawrence was soon a wreck; but Perry crossing to another ship in an open boat, and, amid the fierce fire of the enemy, took a fresh start and broke through the enemy's line, pouring from both sides of his vessel a deadly fire. In fifteen minutes he forced the enemy to surrender. Two armies were awaiting the result of this battle. Immediately after the victory, General Harrison crossed to Malden, and began a pursuit of the retreating British. The latter were overtaken at the Thames, and completely routed. Tecumseh was killed, and the Indians subdued.

Perry's victory on Lake Erie had been followed by a like success on Lake Ontario by Chauncey. And, in April, General Dearborn crossed from Sackett's Harbor to make an attack upon Toronto, an important post of the British. On the 27th seventeen hundred men made the attack, and, although they were met with great force by the British, succeeded in driving them from the town. They then recrossed the Niagara to Fort George, from which the British retreated. But the Americans pursued, overtook, and defeated them. Meantime the British attacked Sackett's Harbor, which had been left undefended, but the militia was called out, and they were driven back with heavy loss.

No further action took place until November, when the conquest of Montreal was attempted. General Wilkinson, with seven thousand men, left French Creek, and sailed down the St. Lawrence, their passage being constantly opposed by the British and Indians on the shores. On the 11th a severe battle was fought, after which the Americans went to St. Regis, where they awaited forces from Plattsburg. As these did not arrive, they went into winter-quarters at the Salmon River. Meantime Fort Niagara was captured by the British, and Buffalo burnt.

At sea the American navy did not meet with the success of the previous year. On February 24th, a severe battle took place between the British brig Peacock and the American sloop Hornet, in which the Americans were victorious. On June 1st, the Chesapeake, under Captain Lawrence, answered a challenge from the Shannon, and the furious action which followed resulted in the boarding and capture of the Chesapeake. Lawrence himself made a brave fight, but fell mortally wounded. On August 14th, the American Argus was captured off the coast of England by the Pelican; and on September 5th, the Enterprise captured the British brig Boxer.

In August of this year, the Creek Indians of Alabama, who had taken up arms in sympathy with the Indians of the North, surprised Fort Mimms, near Mobile, and massacred nearly all its inhabitants.

An army was raised, and General Jackson, at the head of a force from Tennessee, entered the State from the north, and attacked and defeated the Indians at several points. At last they intrenched themselves at Horse Shoe Bend, and here Jackson surrounded and destroyed them almost to a man.

1814.—Another invasion of Canada was determined upon for the spring; but there was so much delay in getting ready that it was not until July 3d that Generals Scott and Ripley crossed to Fort Erie, which immediately surrendered. Next day, on their way down the Chippewa River, they were met by the British under General Riall, and a severe battle ensued, in which the Americans were successful. General Riall retreated to Burlington Heights; and on the 23d, Scott found the enemy strongly posted near Niagara Falls. A battle followed which lasted until darkness fell, but neither side would yield.

Then General Riall and his staff were captured, and a detachment was sent under Colonel Miller to take a battery upon a commanding hill. When this was gained the British were driven from the field. This was the most severe battle of the war; the British loss being nearly nine hundred, and the American over eight hundred. After the battle of Niagara, the American army returned to Fort Erie. Here the British, under General Drummond, began a siege on the 4th of August, which lasted with varying success until the 17th of September, when the advance works of the British were destroyed; and, hearing that reinforcements were expected, they retreated to Fort George. The Americans, after destroying Fort Erie, went into winter-quarters at Buffalo.

The invasion was also attempted in the North by General Wilkinson, who, however, only reached the Sorel River, when he was repulsed and obliged to fall back to Plattsburg. Here he was superseded by General Izard. But the British now determined to invade New York, and get control of Lake Champlain, which was occupied by Commodore MacDonough. General Prevost reached Plattsburg; then for four days he tried to cross the Saranac River, but was kept back the while by General Macomb. When the British fleet was ready to assist, a united attack was planned. On the 11th of September the fleet opened the battle with MacDonough; and although the American ships were soon badly shattered, the British were more so, and were obliged to strike their colors. On land the British were overpowering the Americans with their numbers, when the news of the naval victory so inspirited them, that Prevost was obliged to retreat. He then went back into Canada.

The war on the Canada frontier was now over; but it still raged in other parts of the country. In August, a fleet bearing four thousand soldiers entered Chesapeake Bay, where the American fleet was too weak to oppose them. Landing, they proceeded at once to Washington, defeated the militia who tried to prevent their advance, and burned the city. Then they advanced upon Baltimore. Here, however, they were checked by the militia, and withdrew to their ships.

The last land contest of the war took place in the South. In August, by permission of the Spanish authorities, there was fitted out at Pensacola a fleet of British ships, for the purpose of besieging Mobile. General Jackson, after remonstrating in vain with the authorities, marched against Pensacola and drove the British out. Learning that they intended the conquest of Louisiana, he prepared for its defense. On the 23d of December Generals Jackson and Coffee advanced to meet the British, under Sir Edward Pakenham, and were obliged to retreat. But Jackson took his position a little below New Orleans, and awaited the enemy. On the 28th cannonading commenced, but without success. On the 8th of January the British advanced for an assault. Jackson, intrenched behind earthworks, defended by sand-bags and cotton-bales, poured such a deadly fire upon the British columns that they were nearly destroyed. Their loss was seven hundred, while that of the Americans was but eight killed and thirteen wounded.

Peace had been arranged on December 24th, at Ghent ; but the news had not yet reached the United States, and it was not until the 18th of February that the treaty was ratified. The navies, still ignorant of the fact, carried on hostilities until spring. The Constitution, off Cape St. Vincent, captured two ships after severe fighting ; and later, off Brazil, the Hornet captured the Penguin.

News of the peace was received with great joy, for the commerce of the Eastern States had been destroyed by the war on the seas. The coast from Maine to Delaware was blockaded, and the financial affairs of the country were in a wretched condition.

No sooner had the treaty of Ghent been ratified than the United States were obliged to undertake another war. This time it was against the pirates of the Mediterranean, who renewed their attacks upon American merchant ships. Commodore Decatur commanded the fleet of nine vessels, and, on the 17th and 19th of June, 1815, captured Moorish frigates carrying a number of men. Then he went to Algiers, and demanded a treaty. By this treaty the Dey gave up all claim to tribute, and promised no further interference. The same course was pursued with Tripoli and Tunis.

In 1816, Indiana was admitted into the Union, and at the same time a colony for free negroes was established in Liberia. The result of the elections held this year was that James Monroe became president, and Daniel Tompkins, vice-president.

CHAPTER XII.

Monroe's Administration.—1817–1825.—

The important event of this administration was the admission of new States, and the questions that arose thereupon. In 1817, Mississippi was organized as a State, and admitted. Illinois was admitted in 1818, and Alabama in 1819. In the latter year a bill proposing the formation of the territories of Missouri and Arkansas was brought before Congress. A hot debate followed as to whether slavery should or should not be prohibited in the new territories, which resulted in their formation without any restrictions concerning slavery. But in the next year, when Missouri sought admission as a State, it was opposed by the enemies of slavery. At the same time, however, Maine was asking the same thing, and those who desired slavery in Missouri were determined to oppose the admission of Maine. In order to settle the dispute, the Missouri Compromise was passed. Both States were admitted ; Missouri as a slave state. But the bill provided that thereafter slavery should not exist in the States formed from the Louisiana territory north of parallel thirty-six degrees, thirty minutes ; and that it might exist in States formed south of that line if the people of those States so willed.

The Spanish colonies in South America, having revolted from their sovereign, had resolved themselves into republics. In 1822 their independence was acknowledged by the United States government ; and when it seemed possible that an attempt would be made by the allied powers of Europe, to wrest from them their liberty, the United States interfered, and the president declared that the American continents "were not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power." This has since been known as the Monroe Doctrine.

John Quincy Adams' Administration.—1825-1829.—In 1826 a treaty was concluded with the Creek Indians in Georgia by which they gave up all their lands in that State, and agreed to move beyond the Mississippi. Treaties were also concluded with the Kansas Indians and the Osages of Arkansas, by which their lands were ceded to the United States.

In 1826, on the fiftieth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence, Jefferson and John Adams died. One had written, and both had signed the Declaration ; and both had been presidents of the nation which it had brought into existence.

Jackson's Administration.—1829-1837.—The tariff bill, which had been brought forward but not settled during the preceding administration, came up again in the early part of this. By its provisions a revenue tax was imposed upon certain imported goods. Several of the States opposed the bill, and South Carolina went so far as to declare the law unconstitutional, and to refuse payment. The question was debated in the Senate ; but the president not waiting for it to be decided in that way, first issued a proclamation in which he denied the right of any State to set at nought an act of Congress, and then ordered troops to the disaffected State. The matter was amicably settled by a compromise suggested by Henry Clay.

In 1832 a proposal was made to recharter the Bank of the United States, whose charter would expire in 1836. This was strongly opposed by the president, and his opposition raised a strong party against him called the Whig party, the leaders of which were Clay and Webster.

Certain lands in Wisconsin Territory, purchased from the Indians a few years before, had not been settled by whites, and the Indians still held them. Now, when they were wanted, the Indians refused to give them up. A force was sent against them, and several battles followed, in one of which their chief, Black Hawk, was taken prisoner. He advised his people to yield to the demands of the whites, and they withdrew into Iowa.

In 1834, the Indian Territory was organized in order that the Cherokee Indians, formerly in Georgia, might have a home beyond the Mississippi. They proved unwilling to go, however, until forced to do so by United States troops ; and even then it was not until 1838 that the removal was complete:

The Seminoles in Florida also disputed their treaty, and in 1835 war broke out with them. Several battles were fought at the Withlacoochie, at Fort Drane, and at Wahoo Swamp. But no decisive result was reached. In 1837, the war was renewed. In the fall, Osceola, the chief of the nation, was taken prisoner ; but the war went on until December 25th, 1838, when Colonel Taylor marched into the Everglades, and fought a desperate battle, in which the savages were defeated. In the next year, the chiefs signed a treaty, and agreed to remove to the West.

In 1836, Arkansas was admitted into the Union ; and Michigan Territory was organized as a State, and admitted the next year. At the elections of 1836, Martin Van Buren was chosen president, and Richard M. Johnson, vice-president.

Van Buren's Administration.—1837—1841.

—In the first year of this administration, the country was distressed by a financial panic. Speculation had increased greatly, and business was to a great extent conducted upon a credit system. Jackson had issued the specie circular, which demanded that all payments for public lands should be made in coin. It was not until the present administration that the effect was felt, and the result was panic. A session of Congress was called for the purpose of devising some method by which relief might be obtained. A way was devised at the next session, and business began to revive. In 1838, the banks resumed payment.

In 1837, some Canadians conceived the idea of revolting from Great Britain. Many were found in the United States to sympathize with the movement, and especially in New York. A party from the latter State seized an island in the Niagara River, and fortified it. But the government interfered, and order was restored.

As early as the winter of 1839 the question of the next president began to be considered. The present administration was blamed for all the distress which the people had suffered, and when the elections took place, Van Buren was defeated for a second term, and General Harrison, the Whig candidate, chosen.

Harrison and Tyler's Administration.—1841–1845.—One month after his inauguration, the president died, and was succeeded by the vice-president, John Tyler. Tyler's first official action was a great disappointment to the party that had made him president: he refused to recharter the Bank of the United States. In consequence, every member of his cabinet resigned except Webster, the secretary of state. And it was fortunate that he did not follow the example of his colleagues; for his skill was needed in order that a difficulty with Great Britain concerning the north-eastern boundary of the United States might be peaceably settled.

In 1842, the people of Rhode Island had a domestic quarrel over a new constitution, and matters went so far that troops were sent to restore order. In the same year was erected the Bunker Hill monument, the corner stone of which had been laid by General Lafayette in 1825.

In the latter part of this administration the Mormons, who had settled first in Missouri, and then in Illinois, were forced to remove farther West. In order to be beyond reach of hostility, they crossed the Rocky Mountains, and settled in what has since become Utah Territory.

Now another event stirred and divided the people. In 1835, Texas, weary of her oppressive government, resolved to separate from Mexico. Accordingly, the Texans took up arms, and in a battle in April, 1836, gained a decisive victory. As soon as its independence was recognized, Texas sought admission into the United States. Van Buren feared war with Mexico, and denied the request. The question came up again in 1844, and upon this the election of the next president was based. The Democrats favored, the Whigs opposed, annexation. The annexation party carried the day. James K. Polk was elected, and Texas was admitted early in the following year.

In 1844, the Morse telegraph was established. After several years of experimenting and of delay, a line was set up between Baltimore and Washington, and the first message sent over it, carried the news of Polk's nomination.

CHAPTER XIII.

THE ADMINISTRATIONS—CONTINUED.—THE MEXICAN WAR.

Polk's Administration.—1845-'49.—As soon as the annexation was confirmed, Texas asked the president to send some troops to protect her in case of trouble with Mexico, as a dispute had already arisen concerning the boundary line. The Texans claimed the Rio Grande as the western boundary, and the Mexicans claimed the Nueces. When the Mexicans refused to settle the matter by treaty, American forces were sent under General Zachary Taylor to the Rio Grande; and, on the eighth of March, 1846, he took his position near that river at Fort Brown.

On April 26th, the Mexicans under General Arista occupied Matamoras, while others crossed the river, and hostilities commenced. By the time that Taylor had secured his stores at Point Isabel, the Mexicans had taken a stand at Palo Alto. Here, on May 8th, the Americans met them. A severe engagement took place, in which the Mexicans, though vastly superior in numbers, were defeated. On his way back to Fort Brown, Taylor again met the Mexicans in strong position at Resaca de la Palma. Here they made a far more desperate fight, but again were beaten, and fled across the river.

As soon as the news of these battles reached Washington, Congress authorized " " " " to call for volunteers. Fifty thous en a regiment mistook an order, and placed the army in a dangerous position ; but the other troops rallied, and the field was won against fearful odds.

At the beginning of 1847, Scott arrived at the scene of action, and took some of Taylor's troops to join his own in an expedition into the heart of the country. In March, he landed at Vera Cruz with twelve thousand men. The city was strongly fortified, and guarded by numbers superior to those under Scott ; but by the end of the month it was forced to surrender. Santa Anna held Cerro Gordo, but it surrendered ; and shortly afterward Jalapa, which was supposed to be impregnable, did the same. Then Perote, then Puebla, which, though having eighty thousand inhabitants, offered no resistance to the small army. Scott's forces, now somewhat reduced, were reinforced, and he began his march to Mexico. Not only was the city difficult of access and well defended, but the road to it lay past several strong castles and fortresses. But Scott was determined to reach the city. On August 29th, one of the outposts, Contreras, was taken ; then San Antonio, then Churubusco. Scott then rested his forces until September 7th. Then Chapultepec was carried ; and, on the night of the 13th the city of Mexico was evacuated by the government, and the American flag was raised next day in the capital. The Mexicans made attempts to regain some of the captured cities, but they were unsuccessful.

Early in 1848, peace was concluded. The Rio Grande was made the western boundary of Texas, and New Mexico and California ceded to the United States ; in return for which the United States promised to pay fifteen million dollars to Mexico.

Shortly after the cession of California, great excitement was caused by the discovery of gold on the Sacramento River. People flocked thither from the East, and from all parts of the old world, and the population grew with great rapidity.

84 Taylor—Fillmore Administration. [CHAP. XIII.]

In the meantime, Florida and Iowa had been admitted into the Union; the former in 1845, and the latter in 1846. In 1848, Wisconsin was admitted. In the fall of this year, General Zachary Taylor being the popular favorite, was chosen president, with Millard Fillmore as vice-president.

Taylor and Fillmore's Administration.—1849–1853.—The organization of California led to severe disputes in Congress. By the constitution which California adopted, slavery was prohibited in her territory; and when she asked to be admitted into the Union, the Southern States wished to refuse because of her determination regarding slavery. They claimed that as the line fixed by the Missouri Compromise passed through the territory, slavery ought not to be prohibited. Another cause for agitation, not only in Congress, but throughout the whole country, was that Texas, a slave State, insisted that New Mexico belonged to her territory; while New Mexico claimed a separate government. In 1850, Henry Clay offered his celebrated Omnibus Bill, which provided for all the disputed points, and its passage allayed, for the time, the difficulties.

While this bill was before Congress, the president died, and Fillmore assumed the duties of the office. During this year an attempt at revolution took place in Cuba, with the aid or at the instigation of some American adventurers, and failed. A second attempt was made the next year, which resulted in the defeat of the insurgents, and the execution of their leader.

A dispute arose with England concerning the Newfoundland fisheries, which threatened the country with trouble; but it was settled by treaty in 1854. Three statesmen died during this administration—John C. Calhoun, Henry Clay, and Daniel Webster.

The point on which the result of the elections of 1852 depended was the Compromise of 1850. The Whigs and Democrats agreed that its provisions should be adhered to. Another party, which had arisen out of the slavery disputes, the Free Soil party, thought these provisions unwise. The Democratic candidate, Franklin Pierce, was elected.

Pierce's Administration.—1853—1857.—In the first year of this administration the route for a railroad to the Pacific was explored; a possible second war with Mexico was averted by the purchase of some land which both Mexico and New Mexico claimed; and a treaty with Japan was proposed, although it was not concluded until the next year.

In 1854 Senator Douglass proposed the organization of the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska, claiming that the question of slavery should be settled by the people of the States themselves. This was violently opposed by Northern members, because it was directly contrary to the provisions of the Missouri Compromise, but it was at last carried. The decision being left to the States, both parties used their utmost influence to have the matter decided according to their view. The result was that rival governments were formed, and a constitution adopted by each; but civil war broke out between the parties, and in 1856 the government was obliged to interfere and restore order. The excitement thus created spread throughout the country. It was not until 1859 that a constitution forbidding slavery was ratified; and in 1861 Kansas was admitted into the Union.

During this administration an affair of diplomacy attracted considerable attention. Martin Koszta was a Hungarian who fled from Austria to escape punishment for rebellion against the government. He came to the United States, and took out some of the papers necessary to his becoming a citizen. Shortly after this he went to Europe, and was seized by the Austrian authorities. America demanded that he should be released, and the affair was left for the Austrian Minister at Washington and the Secretary of State to settle. The result was that Koszta was sent back to the United States.

The Democratic candidate this year was James Buchanan, who was a strong advocate of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. The Free Soil party nominated John C. Fremont, but Buchanan was elected by a large majority.

Buchanan's Administration.—1857-1861.—

In the first year of this administration a rebellion broke out among the Mormons. They had been under the governorship of Brigham Young. But the central government, deeming some of their laws inconsistent with the laws of the country, sent a judge to carry on the business of the courts, and he was not permitted to exercise the duties of his office. The government then appointed a new governor for Utah, and sent an army to enforce obedience. The Mormons prepared to resist the troops, but before they arrived an agent of the government appeared who had authority to settle matters without using force. Gradually order was restored, and the troops withdrawn.

In 1858, the Atlantic cable was laid, thus connecting the two hemispheres by telegraph. In the same year, Minnesota was admitted into the Union, and in the next year Oregon.

All through the administration the slavery question was agitated. In the beginning of it, Chief Justice Taney had decided a case which had come before him, by declaring that slaves had no rights, except as the property of their owners, and had further declared the Missouri Compromise, and the Compromise of 1850, to be null, and contrary to the meaning of the constitution. In 1859, the excitement was increased by an attempt to rouse the slaves to rebellion. John Brown, with a party of twenty men, seized the government arsenal at Harper's Ferry, and held it until they were taken and imprisoned by the Virginia militia. The leader and some of his followers were tried, convicted, and hanged.

While this excitement was fresh in the minds of the people, a presidential election was pending. There were four candidates. The Republican candidate was Abraham Lincoln; the candidate of the Northern Democrats, Stephen A. Douglas; of the Southern Democrats, John C. Breckinridge; and of the American party, John Bell. Several of the Southern States had declared that if the country was to be controlled by the principles of the Republican party, the Union could no longer be held together. The election of Lincoln by a large majority of the electoral college was, therefore, the signal for secession. President Buchanan admitted that, although he did not believe in the right of a State to secede, he had no authority to prevent it. Accordingly, the States which sought separation carried their wishes into effect during the interval between Lincoln's election and his inauguration. South Carolina set the example; and on December 20th passed a resolution dissolving her connection with the other States. In quick succession, Mississippi, Florida, Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, and Texas followed; and in February, 1861, the government of the Confederate States of America was organized at Montgomery, with Jefferson Davis as president, and Alexander H. Stephens, as vice-president.

The country at large was unprepared for war. The seceded States had seized nearly all the forts and arsenals lying in their territory; and only Fortress Monroe, in Virginia, Forts Sumter and Moultrie, at Charleston, and Fort Pickens, in Florida, remained to the national government.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE CIVIL WAR.

Lincoln's Administration.—1861-1865.—

Shortly after Lincoln's inauguration, the Southern States asked for a recognition of their independence, which was denied. On April 11th, General Beauregard sent an order to Major Anderson, the commander of Fort Sumter, to surrender. Upon his refusal, fire was opened upon the fort, which lasted thirty-four hours. At the end of that time, the fort was destroyed, and Anderson was forced to abandon it. This was the signal for war. Three days after this event, the president called for seventy-five thousand men to put down the rebellion. Virginia then seceded, and in the next month was followed by Arkansas and North Carolina.

The first bloodshed of the war occurred in Baltimore on April 19th, as some Massachusetts troops were passing through that city on their way to Washington. They were fired upon by a mob, and three men killed. The armory at Harper's Ferry, and the Norfolk navy yard were next seized by the Confederates. On May 3d, eighty-three thousand troops were called for, for three years' service. Active preparations were made both in the North and in the South. General Scott was appointed commander-in-chief of the Federal forces, and ships of war were sent to blockade the Southern ports.

1861.—Events in the East.—During the latter part of May, General McClellan moved toward the mountains of West Virginia, and on July 11th gained a victory at Rich Mountain. This was followed by victories at Cheat River and at Gauley River, by General Rosecrans. In September, General Robert E. Lee was defeated at Cheat River, and Federal authority was established in West Virginia. Meantime there was considerable skirmishing in the Shenandoah Valley ; but the first great battle of the war was not fought until July 21st. Then General Beauregard was posted near Bull Run. The Union army, under General McDowell, advanced toward him from Centreville on their way to Richmond, then the capital of the Confederacy. A severe battle followed in which the Federals had at first a prospect of victory ; but General Joseph E. Johnston, whom McDowell supposed at a safe distance in the Shenandoah Valley, came up and so altered matters that the Union army was completely routed. This result filled the South with delight, and the North with mortification. Troops poured into Washington in such numbers that by the middle of October there were one hundred and fifty thousand men in the Federal army. General Scott resigned his command, and General George B. McClellan was appointed in his place.

1861.—Events in the West.—In the West, Missouri was the scene of civil war. In the previous March, the Legislature had failed to pass a vote of secession ; but as the secessionists were numerous, hostilities soon arose between the two parties. United States stores were seized by both parties, and several engagements took place, from which there were no decisive results except that Carthage and Lexington were left under Federal control, and Belmont on the Mississippi under Confederate. Kentucky had decided to remain neutral, but the Confederates entered that State, and took possession of Columbus. Colonel U. S. Grant undertook to force them from the city, but failed.

During this year the Federal government succeeded in blockading the Southern coast so as to prevent nearly all communication with other countries.

The country came very near being involved in a war with England at this time, from which it was saved by William H. Seward, Secretary of State. The Confederate government sent James M. Mason and John Slidell as ambassadors to England and France. The English vessel in which they were was overtaken by the San Jacinto under Captain Wilkes, was boarded, and Mason and Slidell seized and carried back to the United States. England resented the insult to her flag, and demanded reparation. Although many of the people in their excitement approved of what had been done, Secretary Seward sent a suitable apology to the English government, ordered the men to be released from prison, and sent them to Europe.

1862.—Events in the West.—The first action of this year took place in the West. In January, Colonel Garfield defeated the Confederates in East Kentucky. Later in the same month they were again defeated by General Thomas, at Mill Spring, with heavy loss on both sides. The Federal forces then moved against Forts Henry and Donelson. In February, Commodore Foote and General Grant left Cairo with fifteen thousand men, sailed up the Tennessee River, and forced the Confederates from Fort Henry. They escaped to Fort Donelson, on the Cumberland, and Foote followed them, only stopping at Cairo for provisions. When he arrived at the fort he found Grant awaiting him, and the siege began. The gun boats were driven back, but Grant forced a surrender on the 16th of February. General Grant next proceeded up the Tennessee, where near Pittsburg Landing he was attacked on April 6th by Generals Beauregard and Albert S. Johnston. The battle lasted the entire day, and the Federals were driven back; but during the night reinforcements arrived from General Buell's army, and the next day the Confederates were obliged to retreat to Corinth. More than ten thousand fell on each side in this fierce battle, and Johnston, one of the ablest of the Confederate generals, was killed. In May, General Halleck moved the Union troops to Corinth, which was evacuated on his approach.

Meantime, the Confederates, fearing that they could not hold Columbus, had removed to Island No. 10 in the Mississippi, a few miles below that city. Toward the point Commodore Foote and General Pope advanced. Pope got possession of New Madrid on the western shore, and then aided Foote in his attack upon the Island. On April 7th the garrison was captured while attempting to escape. On June 6th Commodore Davis took Memphis, which opened the Mississippi down to that point.

In the early part of 1862, a fleet under Commodore Goldsborough, and a land force under General Burnside, took Roanoke Island, New-Berne, and Beaufort; and in April Fort Pulaski surrendered to General Gillmore. During the same month, General Butler and Admiral Farragut entered the Mississippi. Thirty miles above its mouth, the river was commanded by two powerful forts. These Farragut began to bombard; but at the end of five days he had produced little effect, so he determined to force his way past them. Breaking the chain which had been placed across the river, he sailed up to New Orleans in spite of the resistance of the Confederate fleet. The forts, a few days afterward, surrendered to Admiral Porter, and General Butler was placed in command of New Orleans.

After the loss of Fort Donelson, the Confederates withdrew into East Tennessee, but returned to Kentucky in August, and took Richmond, Lexington, and Frankfort. General Bragg also entered the State from Chattanooga, and advanced to Louisville, which was only saved by the arrival of General Buell. In October, the Federal army was so strong, that General Bragg withdrew from the State, and posted himself at Murfreesborough, Tennessee.

On September 19th, the Confederates, under General Price, were defeated at Iuka, Mississippi, after a severe battle, by Generals Rosecrans and Grant : after which Rosecrans withdrew to Corinth, and Grant went into Tennessee. A Confederate attack upon Corinth shortly afterwards was defeated.

General Sherman was now at Memphis, and General Grant removed to La Grange, in order to unite with him in an attack upon Vicksburg ; but the plan had to be given up, for Grant was forced to retreat, and Sherman, after an unsuccessful attack at Chickasaw Bayou, was obliged to take to his gunboats in the Mississippi.

The last battle in the West this year was fought at Murfreesborough. Here General Rosecrans found the Confederates, on December 30th, in a strong position, and determined to bring a superior force to bear upon Bragg's weakest position. But Bragg had determined to do the same thing, and in consequence the right wing of the Federal army was driven from the field. By the heroism of part of the forces, the Confederates were kept from further success, until Rosecrans could rearrange his ranks. When night fell Rosecrans had been defeated, but he determined not to leave the field without another attempt. On January 2d, the battle broke out afresh, and lasted all day. In the afternoon, it seemed that the Federal forces must give way ; but they rallied, and drove the enemy from the field with immense loss.

1862.—Events in the East.—The forces in the East had not been inactive. In order to prevent the Confederates taking position at Manassas, General Banks went into the Valley of the Shenandoah. At Kernstown, "Stonewall" Jackson fell upon a division under General Shields, but was repulsed. Then Jackson pursued the main army, and Banks retreated to the Potomac. But now the Confederate general found himself in danger from General Fremont, so he hastened back down the valley. He reached Cross Keys before he could be attacked, and then the attack was a failure. He then defeated General Shields in an engagement, and joined the army for the defense of Richmond.

With the purpose of taking Richmond, General McClellan left Washington on March 10th, with two hundred thousand men, and advanced as far as Manassas Junction. Here he changed his plans, and embarked his troops for Fortress Monroe, in order to advance from that point. It was April 4th before the troops left Fortress Monroe. Yorktown was then held by ten thousand Confederates, under General Magruder, and the Federal army lay for a month outside the city awaiting its surrender. At the end of that time the city was taken, and the forces advanced, overtaking and defeating the enemy at Williamsburg and West Point. The army now approached Richmond; but the Confederates met them at Fair Oaks, and a severe battle was fought. Although the Confederates were driven back, the victory did not avail much. General J. E. Johnston was severely wounded in this battle, and the command devolved upon General Robert E. Lee, who continued commander-in-chief to the end of the war. On June 25th, Lee attacked the Federals at Oak Grove, but without result. Next day, at Mechanicsville, the Federals gained the victory; but on the next, at Gaines' Mill, Lee was successful. On the 29th battles were fought at Savage's Station and White Oak Swamp; on the 30th at Frazier's Farm, and on the 1st of July the Federals had reached Malvern Hill. Here Lee determined to make an attack, and a fierce struggle ensued; but he was forced to fall back on Richmond. McClellan, instead of going on to Richmond, which he thought he could not do without reinforcements, now moved to Harrison's Landing, and nothing was gained by all this hard fighting and fearful loss of life.

General Lee, seeing that the Federals were not going to follow up their advantage, moved northward for the purpose of invading Maryland. General Pope collected the Union forces that were scattered over the surrounding country, and he also moved northward. On August 28th and 29th, there was a severe battle at Manassas Junction, in which thousands fell, and among them Generals Kearney and Stevens. Pope escaped with his shattered army to Washington, where he was relieved of his command by General Halleck, who at the same time appointed McClellan commander-in-chief.

Lee pressed on to Maryland, and, on the 6th of September, took Frederick, and, on the 10th, Hagerstown. McClellan followed, with a hastily organized army, and overtook the enemy at South Mountain, where a division under Hooker fought a successful battle. On the 14th Lee fell back to Antietam Creek. McClellan was now in his rear; and, on the 15th, there was some slight fighting. Next day both armies prepared for battle. On the 17th and 18th the contest raged—now with success on one side, now on the other; but finally the Union troops were victorious, and compelled General Lee to withdraw into Virginia. Again nothing resulted from a battle in which more than twenty thousand men fell. This was accounted for by the fact, that the Federal army was not supplied with the necessary stores. McClellan followed Lee's retreat as far as Rectorstown.

Another campaign against Richmond was now planned, and the time up to November 6th was spent in preparation, when the command was transferred from McClellan to Burnside. Again there were delays; and it was not until December 11th that the troops were ready to cross the Rappahannock. They had decided to do this at Fredericksburg, which Lee had strongly defended. On the 12th the army crossed, and on the 13th the battle began. First, the Federals broke through the Confederate lines, but only to be driven back with great loss. Charge after charge was made without success, while men were mowed down by the thousand. On the 15th the shattered army recrossed the river.

1863.—On the 1st day of January President Lincoln issued his Proclamation of Emancipation, by which slavery was prohibited throughout the United States.

Events in the West.—The first military operations were on the Mississippi. The attempt at Chickasaw Bayou having failed, General McClelland, who had superseded General Sherman, moved to Arkansas Post, which surrendered with a number of prisoners, some arms and ammunition. He then returned to Vicksburg. General Grant, after trying in every way to gain access to the city from above, determined to run the fleet past the city's batteries. This was accomplished in safety. Landing in April, a little below the city, Grant crossed first to Jackson, defeating the Confederates in several engagements on the way. At Jackson, on May 14th, he met a part of Johnston's army coming to the relief of Vicksburg. This he defeated, and captured the city. He then turned back to Vicksburg. General Pemberton came out to meet him, but was defeated, and withdrew into the city. Grant first tried to storm it, but this was attended by such loss of life that he began a regular siege. Although in a starving condition, the garrison held out for more than a month. On July 4th, the Confederate army of nearly thirty thousand men surrendered, and great quantities of arms and ammunition fell into the hands of the Federal general. Several smaller towns on the river now surrendered, and thus the Mississippi through its entire length was completely under Federal control. This great victory was very disastrous to the Confederate cause.

In June, General Rosecrans took position at Chattanooga, and, in September, General Bragg stationed himself at Chicamauga Creek, not far off. Here a fierce battle was fought, which lasted two days. At the end of this time, Rosecrans' defeated army withdrew to Chattanooga—the army being saved from destruction by the bravery and skill of General Thomas. While Bragg was besieging the city, Generals Hooker and Sherman arrived with reinforcements; and, in October, General Grant came to take command. On the 24th of November an assault was made by Hooker upon the Confederates on Lookout Mountain. The troops charged up the sides of the steep elevation, protected by a dense fog, and shortly after noon reached the summit, driving the Confederates down into the valley; and, on the next day, the same thing was done at Missionary Ridge. The Confederates were completely routed, and retired to Dalton, Georgia. Sherman then went to the relief of Burnside, whom Longstreet was besieging at Knoxville.

In July of this year General Morgan made a desperate raid into Ohio and Indiana. Starting from Sparta, Tennessee, he crossed Kentucky, through Indiana into Ohio, destroyed property, and took many prisoners; yet met with no resistance strong enough to overcome him. At last he was captured and imprisoned, but escaped, after a few months, to Richmond.

1863.—Events in the East.—After the defeat of Burnside at Fredericksburg, General Hooker was placed in command. In April, he crossed the Rapahannock, and on May 2d, was attacked at Chancellorsville by Lee and Jackson. Night fell before the battle was decided; but the Confederates had lost a man whose place could not be filled—the brave Stonewall Jackson, said to have been struck by a bullet from one of his own men. The next day the battle continued with fearful loss on both sides. On the fifth Hooker withdrew his army across the river. Twenty-nine thousand men fell in this battle! General Lee now determined to invade Maryland and Pennsylvania. He crossed the Potomac, took Hagerstown and Chambersburg, and then drew up his forces near Gettysburg. Hither General Meade, Hooker's successor, hurried his forces. On July 1st, the battle began, and raged that day and the next without decisive results. On the afternoon of the third it was renewed, and with such force that thousands fell. But the Federal army forced the enemy from the field, and Lee was obliged to retreat into Virginia. This was the greatest battle of the war, in the numbers engaged, in the purpose for which it was undertaken, and in the terrible slaughter on both sides; and its result was a blow to the Confederate cause from which it never recovered. The Confederate loss was thirty thousand; the Federal, twenty-three thousand.

During this year there had not been a sufficient number of volunteers to recruit the armies after their dreadful losses, and President Lincoln ordered a draft of men between the ages of twenty and forty-five. This draft met with much opposition, because of the law that enabled some men to purchase exemption from military duty. In New York a riot broke out, during which much property was destroyed. Troops were sent to the assistance of the authorities, and the riot was quelled. There was a strong feeling in many parts of the North against the war; but, nevertheless, the ranks were filled. In June, of this year, West Virginia was organized as a separate State, and admitted into the Union.

1864.—Again, we must go to the West for the first active work of the year. In the spring, General Banks proposed the capture of Shreveport, Louisiana, a place of some importance to the Confederates. Careful preparations were made for a land and naval attack. The army was sent forward in three divisions; one of which was almost destroyed near Mansfield. The fleet was of no use, because of the shallowness of the river; and the whole expedition ended in failure.

General Grant, recently appointed commander-in-chief of the Federal forces, now planned two great campaigns. One, under Sherman, to take Atlanta, the capital of Georgia; and one, under his own leadership, to capture Richmond.

On May 7th, General Sherman set out from Chattanooga with nearly one hundred thousand men; and, about the same time, Johnston, with sixty thousand, came out from Atlanta to meet him, and drive him back. They fought a battle at Dalton, and Johnston was forced to retreat. At Resaca, he made a stand, waited for Sherman, fought him again; was again defeated, and retreated to Dallas. Here, the same result followed, and again at Kenesaw Mountains. At this latter place, Sherman was at first repulsed, but afterward forced Johnston back. By July 10th, Johnston was driven into Atlanta, and was superseded by General Hood. Sherman lay outside the city, and at once began its siege. On September 2d, the Federal forces took possession of Atlanta. Hood endeavored to draw Sherman out of Georgia, by proceeding at once into Tennessee; but Sherman sent General Thomas to oppose him there, and, after burning Atlanta, he began his march to the sea. In Tennessee, Hood approached Nashville, where all of Thomas's force lay; but, before he had finished his preparations for a siege, Thomas fell upon his army, and utterly routed it. Sherman marched straight for Savannah, seizing everything on his way to feed his army, and arrived there in December. Some resistance was offered, and Sherman made preparations for a siege ; but during the night of December 21st the city was evacuated, and the Federal army took possession.

On water the combatants were not idle. In August, Admiral Farragut took Fort Gaines and Fort Morgan, at the entrance of Mobile harbor, after a fierce contest. In October, Albemarle Sound came under Federal control ; and in December, Fort Fisher, at the entrance of Cape Fear River, was taken. Much damage was done to commerce during the war by privateers. After the blockade of the Southern coast, many of these were fitted out in England, and many vessels were destroyed by them. In 1864 a battle took place off the coast of France between the Alabama, built at Liverpool, and commanded by the Confederate Captain Semmes, and the Kearsarge, commanded by Captain Winslow. After a severe fight, the Alabama was sunk.

After the battle of Gettysburg, Lee retired into the Valley of the Shenandoah. In order to prevent his advance to Richmond, General Meade tried to hold the passes of the mountains ; but Lee eluded him, and reached Culpepper. A little later the armies so moved about that Meade occupied Culpepper, and Lee was on the Rappahannock.

On May 3d, 1864, the march on Richmond was begun. On the fourth Meade entered the Wilderness near Chancellorsville. Here the Confederates attacked him, and for three days the battle raged, but it was without decisive results. At Spottsylvania Court House another battle took place ; and on June 1st another only twelve miles from Richmond, in which the Union forces were defeated. On June 3d the Confederate lines on the Chickahominy were carried. Grant now moved South, and on the 15th of June advanced against Petersburg, in connection with forces from Fortress Monroe under General Butler. Failing in an assault, Grant began a regular siege, which lasted all fall and winter.

But, meantime, hoping to draw Grant's attention from Petersburg, Lee sent General Early to threaten an attack on Washington. A series of raids followed ; and, for the purpose of putting an end to them, Grant sent General P. H. Sheridan with forty thousand men. On September 19th he defeated Early at Winchester. He then destroyed much property in the Shenandoah Valley, posted his army at Cedar Creek, and left it. In his absence, his forces were surprised and routed by Early ; but Sheridan hastened to the front, rallied his troops, and defeated the Confederates. On February 25th, 1865, he gained another success over Early, and then went to Petersburg. On April 2d the works at Petersburg were carried, and that night Lee and the officers of the Confederate government left Richmond, which the Federal troops entered next day. The Confederate army fled to Farmville, on the Appomattox, pursued by Grant. Here Grant proposed that Lee should surrender and save further bloodshed. On the 9th of April the two leaders met, and agreed upon the terms of surrender.

In the meantime Sherman was marching northward. On February 1st he left Savannah for Columbia. In vain the Confederates attempted to prevent him. Columbia surrendered at his approach, and Charleston was abandoned at the same time. Sherman pressed northward to Charlotte, North Carolina, and took the town on March 11th. On the 19th he was attacked by Johnston, and his army put for a time in great peril. He went on, however, and on April 13th entered Raleigh. Here Johnston, being informed of Lee's surrender, followed his example, and surrendered his army to Sherman.

The only conditions demanded by the victors were that the Confederates should lay down their arms, retire to their homes, and obey the laws of the Federal government. Jefferson Davis was imprisoned to be tried for treason, but was afterward released without trial.

In the fall of 1864, Lincoln was re-elected ; and his second inaugural took place on the 4th of the March following. On the night of April 14th, while at Ford's Theater, he was basely assassinated by an actor named John Wilkes Booth. At the same hour an attempt was made upon the life of Secretary Seward. The assassins were caught and executed.

CHAPTER XV.

THE ADMINISTRATIONS—CONCLUDED.

Johnson's Administration.—1865—1869.—

Upon the death of Lincoln, the vice-president, Andrew Johnson, succeeded to the presidency.

On February 1st, 1865, an amendment to the Constitution was passed by Congress, abolishing slavery throughout the Union. On the 29th of May, Johnson issued a proclamation pardoning those (with few exceptions) who had been engaged in the rebellion, on condition that they would swear allegiance to the United States.

While the war was in progress, France had given the crown of Mexico to Maximilian of Austria, and sent troops to Mexico to help him maintain his authority. The Mexicans under Juarez revolted ; and the government of the United States resented the violation of the Monroe Doctrine. The French army was compelled to retire, and Maximilian was executed in 1867.

During this administration and the preceding the following territories were formed : Dakota, in 1861 ; Arizona, in 1863 ; Idaho, in 1863 ; Montana, in 1864 ; and Wyoming, in 1868. Nevada was admitted as a State in 1864, and Nebraska in 1867. During this latter year the Territory of Alaska was purchased from Russia for seven million two hundred thousand dollars.

Serious difficulty arose about the reorganization of the seceded States. The president took the ground that they had no right to secede; and, therefore, as they had never been out of the Union, they could not be readmitted to it. Congress took the ground that they had by their secession forfeited their claim to be States of the Union, and must be specially restored. Congress refused to carry out the plans of the president; and the president vetoed the bills passed by Congress. At last so wide was the breach between the president and Congress, that they seized upon his dismissal of Stanton, the secretary of war, from office in February, 1868, as the basis of a trial for impeachment. The president was, however, acquitted. In June and July, 1868, all the States but Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas were readmitted.

At the presidential election, in the fall of 1868, General U. S. Grant was elected by a large majority; and Schuyler Colfax was chosen vice-president.

Grant's Administration.—1869—1877.—In 1868, Congress had adopted an amendment to the Constitution giving the rights of citizenship to all people of the United States, native born or naturalized; and, just before Grant's inauguration, another amendment granted the right of suffrage to all people without regard to race or color. Early in 1870, Virginia, Mississippi, and Texas were readmitted; and once again every State was represented in Congress.

In 1871 the claims against the English government for damage done to American commerce by privateers were heard before an impartial court of arbitration chosen by friendly nations, and England was compelled to pay the United States fifteen and a half million dollars. In 1872 a dispute concerning the northwestern boundary line was decided in favor of the United States.

At the election of 1872, Grant was re-elected by a large majority, with Henry Wilson as vice-president.

In the fall of 1872 it became necessary to send troops against the Modoc Indians in Oregon, who had refused to comply with the demands of the government for their lands. In the early part of 1873 they were surrounded, and peace was proposed; but in the midst of the negotiations the savages murdered General Canby. Negotiations were abandoned, and the Indians besieged. In June they surrendered.

In 1873 rival governors were elected in Louisiana; and the dispute between the factions was carried so far that the president was called upon to settle it. But the faction which was ordered to disband revolted in the next year, and troops were sent to put an end to the trouble.

In 1873 a disastrous panic occurred, caused by the failure of a large banking house in Philadelphia. Other failures followed, and it was a long time before business recovered from the shock.

In 1876, Colorado was admitted into the Union. During this year the centenary of American Independence was celebrated. A great International Exhibition was held in the city of Philadelphia from April to November. The industries of the world were represented there, and people flocked thither from all parts of the world.

By a treaty made in 1867, the Sioux Indians agreed to leave their former reservation, and to settle in the southwestern part of Dakota. But when January, 1876, the time appointed, arrived, the Indians refused to go. The government sent a large force against them, one division of which, under General Custer, made an attack on the 25th of June; but it was surprised, and not a man survived. During the summer and fall several engagements took place in which the Indians were defeated. In the January of the next year a battle was fought in which they were badly beaten. Soon after, Sitting Bull, the Sioux leader, escaped into Canada, and refused to return to the Dakota reservation even under promise of pardon.

The greatest excitement prevailed throughout the country during the winter of 1876-7; over the results of the presidential election. Rutherford B. Hayes was the Republican, and Samuel J. Tilden the Democratic candidate; and both parties claimed the victory. When the question came up in Congress, in December, they decided to leave the decision to a Joint High Commission chosen from the Senate, House of Representatives, and Supreme Court. This Commission declared Rutherford B. Hayes president; but it was only two days before the 4th of March that the decision was reached.

Hayes's Administration, 1877-'81.—Hayes's first action was to free South Carolina and Louisiana from the military rule which had been established there during the last administration. He chose a non-partisan cabinet, and avowed himself a champion of civil service reform, by promising to make no removals from office except for cause.

In the summer of 1877 a riot broke out among the employés of some of the great railroads upon a general reduction of wages. A large amount of property was destroyed by the rioters in Pittsburgh, Baltimore, Chicago, and other railroad centres. Troops were called upon to quell the disturbance.

During the same year General Howard carried on a war with the Nez Percé Indians, which ended in their destruction.

In 1878 Congress passed a bill making silver a legal tender in payment of debts.

At the elections of 1880 the republican candidate, James A. Garfield, was chosen president, with Chester A. Arthur as vice-president.

He had been in office but four months when he was shot by a disappointed office-seeker named Guiteau. The wound was not immediately fatal, but throughout the entire summer the nation watched by the bedside of its president, and in a common anxiety forgot sectional differences. He died in September, 1881, and was succeeded by the vice-president.

The administration of the new president was a grateful surprise to the nation ; for it was both careful and conservative. Except in choosing new advisers, few changes were made in the principal offices of the government.

The elections of 1884 resulted in the defeat of the party which had been in power since 1860. The Democratic candidates were chosen, Grover Cleveland, of New York, being president, and Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, vice-president.

QUESTIONS FOR EXAMINATION.

CHAPTER I.

- 1.—Where did the Northmen live, and what was their character ?
- 2.—Describe the discoveries of Iceland and Greenland.
- 3.—Who discovered the American continent in the ninth century, and what name did he give it ?
- 4.—What places on the coast were explored by the Northmen ?
- 5.—What was the effect of these discoveries ?

CHAPTER II.

- 1.—How many years passed away from the discoveries of the Northmen to the great discovery of Columbus ?
- 2.—What led Columbus to think that he could reach the East Indies by sailing westward ?
- 3.—Give a brief account of Columbus's life prior to his discovery of America.
- 4.—To what monarchs did he apply for assistance ?
- 5.—What sovereigns finally furnished him an outfit ?
- 6.—Name the three vessels with which he sailed on his perilous voyage.
- 7.—When and where did he discover the first land ?
- 8.—How many voyages did Columbus make to the New World ?
- 9.—What rank was conferred upon him by the Spanish sovereigns ?
- 10.—What treatment did he receive from his country ?

CHAPTER III.

- 1.—After whom was the New World called America?
 - 2.—Describe the voyages of John Cabot and his son Sebastian.
 - 3.—Why were these voyages important to the English?
 - 4.—Describe the romantic voyage of Ponce de Leon.
 - 5.—Who discovered the Pacific Ocean? In what year?
 - 6.—Who was the first navigator whose ships sailed around the world?
 - 7.—What important group of islands, still in the possession of Spain, was discovered by this navigator?
 - 8.—In what year and under what flag did Verazzani sail?
 - 9.—Give a brief account of the voyages of Cartier.
 - 10.—Why were the voyages of Verazzani and Cartier important to France?
 - 11.—Describe the voyage and wanderings of De Soto.
 - 12.—What important discovery did he make?

CHAPTER IV.—PART I.

- 1.—Describe the efforts of the English to discover the North-west passage to India.
 - 2.—What unsuccessful attempts were made to plant an English colony in North America?
 - 3.—What navigators sailed under the patronage of Sir Walter Raleigh?
 - 4.—Who gave Virginia its name?
 - 5.—Where was the first permanent English settlement established? In what year?
 - 6.—Who was the first governor, and who was the leading man?

7.—What was the character of the first settlers in Virginia?

8.—With what difficulties did they have to contend?

9.—In what year and by whom was negro slavery introduced?

10.—What was the cause of Bacon's rebellion? Give a brief account of it.

11.—In what years and by whom were North and South Carolina settled?

CHAPTER IV.—PART II.

1.—In what year and by what people was Massachusetts founded?

2.—How did they obtain their peculiar name?

3.—Describe the troubles of the first settlers.

4.—Who was the first governor?

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

A DECLARATION BY THE REPRESENTATIVES OF THE
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, IN CONGRESS
ASSEMBLED, JULY 4, 1776.

WHEN, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the laws of nature and of nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to affect their safety and happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and, accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty to throw off such government, and to provide new guards for their future security. Such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies, and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former systems of government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having, in direct object, the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world:

He has refused his assent to laws the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his assent should be obtained ; and, when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the Legislature—a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their public record, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved representative houses repeatedly for opposing, with manly firmness, his invasions on the the rights of the people.

He has refused, for a long time after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected, whereby the legislative powers, incapable of annihilation, have returned to the people at large for their exercise ; the state remaining, in the meantime, exposed to all the danger of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states ; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners, refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands.

He has obstructed the administration of justice by refusing his assent to laws for establishing judiciary powers.

He has made judges dependent on his will alone for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of new offices, and sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, standing armies without the consent of our Legislature.

He has affected to render the military independent of and superior to the civil power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our Constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation :

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us :

For protecting them by a mock trial, from punishment for any murders which they should commit on the inhabitants of these states :

For cutting off our trade with all parts of the world :

For imposing taxes on us without our consent :

For depriving us, in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury :

For transporting us beyond seas to be tried for pretended offences :

For abolishing the free system of English laws in a neighboring province, establishing therein an arbitrary government, and enlarging its boundaries, so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these colonies :

For taking away our charters, abolishing our most valuable laws, and altering fundamentally the powers of our governments :

For suspending our own Legislatures, and declaring themselves invested with power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated government here by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is, at this time, transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to complete the works of death, desolation, and tyranny already begun, with circumstances of cruelty and perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow-citizens, taken captive on the high seas, to bear arms against their country, to become the executioners of their friends and brethren, or to fall themselves by their hands.

He has excited domestic insurrection against us, and has endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers the merciless Indian savages, whose known rule of warfare is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes, and conditions.

In every stage of these oppressions, we have petitioned for redress in the most humble terms ; our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A prince whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.

Nor have we been wanting in attention to our British brethren. We have warned them, from time to time, of attempts made by their Legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them, by the ties of our common kindred, to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They, too, have been deaf to the voice of justice and consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity which denounces our separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind—enemies in war, in peace, friends.

Declaration of Independence.

We, therefore, the representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved; and that, as free and independent states, they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things which independent states may of right do. And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor.

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

PREAMBLE.

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

ARTICLE I. LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

SECTION I. Congress in General.

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

SECTION II. House of Representatives.

Clause 1. The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several states; and the electors in each state shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

Clause 2. No person shall be a representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state in which he shall be chosen.

Clause 3. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each state shall have at least one representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the state of New Hampshire shall be entitled to choose three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three.

Clause 4. When vacancies happen in the representation from any state, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

Clause 5. The House of Representatives shall choose their speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SECTION III. Senate.

Clause 1. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two senators from each state, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, and each senator shall have one vote.

Clause 2. Immediately after they shall be assembled in consequence of the first election, they shall be divided, as equally as may be, into three classes. The seats of the senators of the first class shall be vacated at the expiration of the second year, of the second class at the expiration of the fourth year, and of the third class at the expiration of the sixth year, so that one third may be chosen every second year; and if vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any state, the executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies.

Clause 3. No person shall be a senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen.

Clause 4. The Vice-President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no vote unless they be equally divided.

Clause 5. The Senate shall choose their other officers, and also a president pro tempore, in the absence of the Vice-President, or when he shall exercise the office of President of the United States.

Clause 6. The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments. When sitting for that purpose, they shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the chief justice shall preside; and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Clause 7. Judgment in case of impeachment shall not extend farther than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment and punishment according to law.

SECTION IV. Both Houses.

Clause 1. The times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each state by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing senators.

Clause 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SECTION V. The Houses separately.

Clause 1. Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members, and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum to do business ; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as each house may provide.

Clause 2. Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member.

Clause 3. Each house shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy ; and the yeas and nays of the members of either house, on any question, shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the journal.

Clause 4. Neither house during the session of Congress shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two houses shall be sitting.

SECTION VI. Disabilities of Members.

Clause 1. The senators and representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the treasury of the United States. They shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective houses, and in going to or returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

Clause 2. No senator or representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office.

SECTION VII. Mode of passing Laws.

Clause 1. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

Clause 2. Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it become a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to that house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, two-thirds of that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that house, it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journal of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the same shall be a law in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their adjournment prevent its return, in which case it shall not be a law.

Clause 3. Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment), shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or, being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

SECTION VIII. Powers granted to Congress.

The Congress shall have power—

Clause 1. To lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;

Clause 2. To borrow money on the credit of the United States;

Clause 3. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes;

Clause 4. To establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States;

Clause 5. To coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures;

Clause 6. To provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States;

Clause 7. To establish post-offices and post-roads;

Clause 8. To promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries ;

Clause 9. To constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court ;

Clause 10. To define and punish piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and offenses against the law of nations ;

Clause 11. To declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water ;

Clause 12. To raise and support armies ; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years ;

Clause 13. To provide and maintain a navy ;

Clause 14. To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces ;

Clause 15. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions ;

Clause 16. To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress ;

Clause 17. To exercise exclusive legislation, in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased, by the consent of the Legislature of the state in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings ; and,

Clause 18. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

SECTION IX. Powers denied to the United States.

Clause 1. The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight ; but a tax or duty may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

Clause 2. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended unless when, in case of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it.

134 Constitution of the United States.

Clause 3. No bill of attainder, or ex-post-facto law, shall be passed.

Clause 4. No capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration herein before directed to be taken.

Clause 5. No tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state.

Clause 6. No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one state over those of another ; nor shall vessels bound to or from one state be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Clause 7. No money shall be drawn from the treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law ; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

Clause 8. No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States ; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.

SECTION X. Powers denied to the States.

Clause 1. No state shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation ; grant letters of marque and reprisal ; coin money ; emit bills of credit ; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts ; pass any bill of attainder, ex-post-facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts ; or grant any title of nobility.

Clause 2. No state shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws : and the net produce of all duties and imposts laid by any state on imports or exports shall be for the use of the treasury of the United States ; and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of the Congress.

Clause 3. No state shall, without the consent of Congress, lay any duty of tonnage, keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state or with a foreign power, or engage in war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger as will not admit of delay.

ARTICLE II. EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

SECTION I. President and Vice-President.

Clause 1. The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President, chosen for the same term, be elected as follows :

Clause 2. Each state shall appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors, equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the state may be entitled in the Congress; but no senator or representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector.

[Clause 3. The electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for two persons, of whom one at least shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves. And they shall make a list of all the persons voted for, and of the number of votes for each; which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. The person having the greatest number of votes shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such majority, and have an equal number of votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately choose by ballot one of them for President; and if no person have a majority, then, from the five highest on the list, the said House shall in like manner choose the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote: a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. In every case, after the choice of the President, the person having the greatest number of votes of the electors shall be the Vice-President. But if there should remain two or more who have equal votes, the Senate shall choose from them by ballot the Vice-President.*]

Clause 4. The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.

Clause 5. No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years, and been fourteen years a resident within the United States.

Clause 6. In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice-President; and the Congress may by law provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice-President, declaring what officer shall then act as President; and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed or a President shall be elected.

Clause 7. The President shall, at stated times, receive for services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Clause 8. Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation :

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States."

SECTION II. Powers of the President.

Clause 1. The President shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States; he may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the executive departments, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices; and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment.

Clause 2. He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Clause 3. The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session.

SECTION III. Duties of the President.

He shall, from time to time, give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both houses, or either of them; and in case of disagreement between them, with respect to the time of adjournment, he may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper ; he shall receive ambassadors and other public ministers ; he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States.

SECTION IV. Impeachment of the President

The President, Vice-President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

ARTICLE III. JUDICIAL DEPARTMENT.

SECTION I. United States Courts.

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior ; and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office.

SECTION II. Jurisdiction of the United States Courts.

Clause 1. The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority ; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls ; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction ; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party ; to controversies between two or more states ; between a state and citizens of another state ; between citizens of different states ; between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states ; and between a state, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.*

Clause 2. In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Clause 3. The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury ; and such trial shall be held in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed ; but when not committed within any state, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed.

* Altered by the 11th Amendment.

SECTION III. Treason.

Clause 1. Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.

Clause 2. The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason; but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.

ARTICLE IV.

SECTION I. State Records.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be approved, and the effect thereof.

SECTION II. Privileges of Citizens, etc.

Clause 1. The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.

Clause 2. A person charged in any state with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice and be found in another state, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the state from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the state having jurisdiction of the crime.

Clause 3. No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

SECTION III. New States and Territories.

Clause 1. New states may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state; nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of the Legislatures of the states concerned, as well as of the Congress.

Clause 2. The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular state.

SECTION IV. Guarantee to the States.

The United States shall guarantee to every state in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion ; and, on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened), against domestic violence.

ARTICLE V. POWER OF AMENDMENT.

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several states, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress ; provided, that no amendment which may be made prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first Article ; and that no state, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

ARTICLE VI. PUBLIC DEBT, SUPREMACY OF THE CONSTITUTION, OATH OF OFFICE, RELIGIOUS TEST.

Clause 1. All debts contracted and engagements entered into before the adoption of this Constitution shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution as under the Confederation.

Clause 2. This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land ; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

Clause 3. The senators and representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several state Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution ; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States.

ARTICLE VII. RATIFICATION OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The ratification of the Conventions of nine states shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the states so ratifying the same.

Done in Convention, by the unanimous consent of the states present, the seventeenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, and of the Independence of the United States of America the twelfth. In witness whereof, we have hereunto subscribed our names.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

ARTICLE I. Freedom of Religion, etc.

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

ARTICLE II. Right to bear Arms.

A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

ARTICLE III. Quartering Soldiers on Citizens.

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

ARTICLE IV. Search Warrants.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

ARTICLE V. Trial for Crime, etc.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in active service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

ARTICLE VI. Rights of accused Persons.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the state and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

ARTICLE VII. Suits at Common Law.

In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

ARTICLE VIII. Excessive Bail.

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishment inflicted.

ARTICLE IX.

The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

ARTICLE X.

The powers not granted to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states respectively or to the people.

ARTICLE XI.

The judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign state.

ARTICLE XII. Mode of choosing the President and Vice-President.

Clause 1. The electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for President and Vice-President, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves ; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as President, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as Vice-President ; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as President, and of all persons voted for as Vice-President, and of the number of votes for each, which lists they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate ; the President of the Senate shall, in the presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted ; the person having the greatest number of votes for President shall be the President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed ; and if no person have such majority, then from the persons having the highest numbers, not exceeding three, on the list of those voted for as President, the House of Representatives shall choose immediately by ballot the President. But in choosing the President, the votes shall be taken by states, the representation from each state having one vote ; a quorum for this purpose shall consist of a member or members from two-thirds of the states, and a majority of all the states shall be necessary to a choice. And if the House of Representatives shall not choose a President, whenever the right of choice shall devolve upon them, before the fourth day of March next following, then the Vice-President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President.

Clause 2. The person having the greatest number of votes as Vice-President shall be the Vice-President, if such number be a majority of the whole number of electors appointed, and if no person have a majority, then from the two highest numbers on the list the Senate shall choose the Vice-President : a quorum for the purpose shall consist of two-thirds of the whole number of senators, and a majority of the whole number shall be necessary to a choice.

Clause 3. But no person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be eligible to that of Vice-President of the United States.

ARTICLE XIII.

SECTION 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

SECTION 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the state wherein they reside. No state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SECTION 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several states according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each state, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a state, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male members of such state, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such state.

SECTION 3. No person shall be a senator or representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice-President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any state, who, having previously taken an oath, as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any state, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two-thirds of each house, remove such disability.

SECTION 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any state shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SECTION 5. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

ARTICLE XV.

SECTION 1. The right of the citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SECTION 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

STATE AND MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT.

WHEN the revolution took place, the royal governors who remained loyal to the King of England left the country, and in the original thirteen colonies the powers of government fell into the hands of the patriots. After the Declaration of Independence all the states except Rhode Island and Connecticut adopted constitutions. A constitution is the established form of government in a state or nation. In a free state, the constitution is superior to the statutes or laws enacted by the legislature, limiting and controlling its powers. In the United States the legislature is created and its powers designated by the constitution. By the constitution, the United States must guarantee to every state a republican form of government.

State Government. Every state government is similar to the United States government, in that it has a legislature consisting of two houses, an upper and a lower; an executive called a governor; and a judiciary that determines the constitutionality of the laws. But the state constitution is subordinate to the constitution of the United States, and its powers and duties are limited to the state.

The Governor. The governor is elected by the state and possesses powers similar to the President of the United States; he is charged with the execution of the laws, and in most of the states has a qualified veto on the acts of the legislature and power to pardon offences against the law.

The Judiciary. This consists of a supreme court or court of appeals, and inferior courts. The judges are elected in some states by the people, in others by the legislature, and in others appointed by the governor and the senate.

The Legislature incorporates boroughs and cities; that is, it gives charters conferring certain powers. All large cities have thus a city government in addition to that of the county and state.

State Divisions. All the states except two are divided into counties. Louisiana is divided into parishes and South Carolina into districts. There is in each county a county seat, in which courts are held and legal documents recorded. The custodian of these documents is called a county clerk. In each county there is also an officer called a sheriff, empowered to execute civil and criminal processes throughout the county. He has charge of the jail and the prisoners, he attends court and keeps the peace.

Municipal Government. The chief magistrate of a city is called a mayor, and has powers similar to those of the governor of a state. The law-making power is usually vested in a board of aldermen, and sometimes in two boards, one acting as a check upon the other. But owing to their rapid growth and to other causes, the government of great cities has become a problem difficult of solution; and many changes have been made from time to time—such as government by commissioners—which destroy the similarity to Federal and State governments.

Officers. State and municipal governments have officers similar in some respects to the Cabinet officers of the President of the United States. In the state they are the secretary, the treasurer, the auditor, the controller, the engineer and the state prison inspector, elected in most of the states by the people. Their titles suggest the nature of their powers and duties. In cities they are the controller and chamberlain (similar to treasurer).

There are many important officers appointed by the governor and senate; and others, like the county clerk, elected by the county. Sometimes, as in the case of the city of New York, the city and county include precisely the same territory.

Courts. Minor matters of litigation are tried before justices of the peace, who are either elected by the people or appointed by some higher power. Most of the law business of the country is transacted in these county courts.

Towns. Many of the states are divided into townships possessing limited political powers. The people meet once a year and elect town officers who levy taxes and regulate local affairs.

School Officers. The Federal government cannot interfere with the public school system of a state. The chief officer is the state superintendent, either elected by the people or appointed by the governor and senate. Other officers are county and city superintendents, school commissioners for counties and cities, trustees and inspectors. In choosing these there is no uniformity. Some are appointed and others elected by the people.
